NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EARNEST greetings for the New Year to all friends, near and distant! Through troubled waters, if it must be so, no less than over calm and sunny seas, we hope to steer a steadfast course. With strong confidence that we have a work to do, that needs doing, and with trust that there must be some good result from honest efforts, we rely on a continuance of that generous support and no less generous forbearance, which have made the past years rich in happiness. Through good or evil report we are set to speak a fearless word. Such a messenger as THE INQUIRER is needed in the community of our Free Churches. We once more ask all our friends to help to make it more worthy of its high ideal, and by a wider distribution more effectual for good.

THE "Essex Hall Year Book" for 1900, more fully noticed in another column, contains one page to which special attention should be given at once. It contains the record of the year's coming events, in which we all ought to be interested. The triennial meeting of the National Conference is to be held at Leicester, April 3 to 6, at which we are glad to learn that papers are to be read by Mrs. Humphry Ward, the Revs. J. Edwin Odgers, P. H. Wicksteed, L. P. Jacks and J. Ellis, and Mr. A. H. Worthington. The London Unitarian Bazaar is to be held on May 1 to 4, in the King's Hall, adjoining the Holborn Restaurant, in which connection the matinée performance of A Midsummer Night's Dream at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on Tuesday, Jan. 16, will be remembered. At the end of May an International Conference of Unitarians is to be held at Boston, U.S., and our own Whitsuntide meetings fall at the beginning of June.

WE regret to learn that the Rev. Stopford Brooke is still very unwell, and his medical adviser will not allow him to think of undertaking any preaching work for some weeks to come. He was due to preach at Chester on Jan. 7, and at Oldham and Rochdale on Jan. 14, but he will be quite unable to fulfil these engagements. We hope he will speedily be restored to health and work.

THE Bishop of London, in a New Year's message to his diocese, which he reluctantly admits must be in words not of encouragement, but of warning, says :—

We cannot shut our ears to the voice of God, which is speaking to us as a nation. It rebukes our pride and our self-conceit; it warns us that we must strive, more than we have been striving of late, to show ourselves worthy of our place in the world.

We must set ourselves to learn that lesson; to practise greater humility; to have less confidence in our own inherent wisdom; to have more sympathy for other peoples, and more charity towards all men.

I wish that I could say that the Church had been doing its best to teach this needful lesson to the English people. Unfortunately, it has only been reproducing in its own quarrels the temper that prevails. Just in the point where an example was most needed, it has not been given. The Church has adopted the methods of politics. It has presented the appearance of parties contending against one another. It has injured its spiritual influence by descending to trivial disputes. It has not shown the English people a higher spirit or a better way.

I should not be true to my office if I did not say this. We of the clergy have need to humble ourselves before God, recognising our special responsibility for the popular temper. The Church is the one organisation that can deal faithfully with this temper. Instead of trying to educate it, the Church has adopted it, and has set before the public eye the familiar spectacle of bodies of Englishmen desperately determined to have their own way by every means in their power.

I would beseech you to think of this in the presence of God; and to remember that, if the Church fails to set forth to the world a higher spirit than the world can produce, it fails altogether.

In conclusion, the Bishop gives to his flock the words of St. Paul, as a motto for the season :—"Let your forbearance be known unto all men." The burden of this message, so faithfully delivered, we would thankfully accept as spoken not to Churchmen only, but to the nation.

THIS week's New Age contains the substance of a powerful sermon by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong on "Christless England and the Devilry of War," preached in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, on Peace Sunday. Having vividly pictured what actual war means, Mr. Armstrong said :—

We have heard much of late of the usages of "civilised warfare." But it is an absolute contradiction in terms. War is as direct a contradiction of civilisation as it is of Christianity itself. Civilisation, when it comes, will strive to settle the disputes and quarrels of nations by civil processes, in which reason and justice, not force and violence, shall be the arbiters. It was open to us to submit our quarrel with the Transvaal to arbitration. We preferred to mass our soldiers on the frontier; and the present woes are the upshot of our preference.

Meanwhile, as we read of battle and of carnage, as the record whether of defeat or victory is flashed across the wires to our island home, let us always imagine the Christ-figure moving through the embattled hosts, the Son of that God who is Father alike of Englishman and Boer; let us conjure up the pity, the sorrow, the deep reproach that would surely be in every line of his dear face; and let those of us who still believe in his Gospel as the Gospel of truth and life, try to think and feel and speak of all these things even as would he, the Lord of Love and blessed Prince of Peace.

And in an eloquent passage preceding the last paragraph, Mr. Armstrong expressed the conviction that the trials through which we are now passing might prove in the end to be a fire of national purification. "It may be the will of God that through the purging fire of great national suffering this English people should be purified, till new ideals, purer, sweeter, truer, arise in their hearts, and the horrors and iniquities of war be so deeply hated that the era of rational and Christian peace shall dawn at last."

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us in reference to the continuance of the war in South Africa :—

There have been recently indications that there are people in the country who believe that it is not for those, who from the first have condemned the policy that led to the war, to urge on the prosecution of the war to the bitter end.

Whether or not you are, yourself, of this opinion, I feel sure you will permit me, in your columns, to suggest that those who hold it should organise themselves, and form a central committee to give expression to their convictions.

Let us not fail in courage because we may be few in numbers, remembering that the Prince of Peace Himself said that: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

Among those who strongly urge that the first opportunity should be embraced of effecting a cessation of hostilities are Dr. Clifford, and the Rev. Silas Hocking. If any movement on the part of the people of this country should prove effective to that end, we should be unspeakably thankful.

WE have received from a correspondent in the North a letter protesting against our recent publication of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's article on Mr. Bryce's "South Africa" in these columns. Objection to the publication is taken on the following ground:—

It is manifestly improper for a religious periodical, whose readers hold all shades of political opinion, to intrude controversial political articles into its columns. We read such papers on Sundays for religious and moral benefit, and are glad for one day in the week to be raised to a higher sphere and leave politics entirely alone.

Such being our correspondent's opinion, we are not at all inclined to publish the rest of his somewhat inflammable letter. We are perfectly aware that the war in South Africa involves questions on which there are vehement differences of opinion among our people, and those who regard them as questions of party politics, in any base sense, as separate from religion, had certainly better hold their peace. But to us it would be an act of moral cowardice to be silent on a matter which vitally effects religion and our national life. And surely we can and ought to discuss such questions, on which there may be serious differences of moral judgment, without bitterness or estrangement; if we cannot, our religion must be a thing of very little worth.

THE Sunday School Association having been invited to take part in the English Education exhibition opened this week at the Imperial Institute, South Kensington, under the auspices of the Education Department, is exhibiting a complete set of its publications and other papers and school requisites. At the same time it has issued a pamphlet on "The Sunday School, its Origin and Growth," specially prepared by the Rev. J. J. Wright, which will be given away at the exhibition. We understand that a copy of this extremely interesting pamphlet will be sent gratis to any one sending a penny for postage to the Association at Essex Hall.

Mr. Wright first tells the story of Robert Raikes, the founder of the modern Sunday-school system, but does full justice to his forerunners in the good work. The first aim of Sunday-schools, "to teach children their duty to God and man," is noted, and the early methods and conditions of teaching are described, and contrasted with more recent developments. The growth of Sunday School Unions, and of our own Association is referred to, and then follow some sections on three urgent needs, (i.) New light for teachers, (ii.) teachers better trained, including a reference to last year's summer session at Oxford, and (iii.) young people to be attached to the Church. In a concluding section on "Essentials and Ideals," Mr. Wright says:—

Our schools of the future may be the Children's Churches, Seminaries of Divine things to the young people within them, gymnasia of moral character to successive rising generations, and because these things are so, though Sunday-school work was never more difficult, it was never more needed, and never more capable of good than to-day.

This exhibition is held as preparatory to the coming Paris Exhibition, to see what educational resources there are to draw from for the English exhibit. Whether Mr. Wright's pamphlet, in a French translation, will find its way to Paris, remains to be seen; but it would be no unworthy representative there of the cause of enlightened religious education.

THE January number of the New Kingdom, which opens with a portrait and a sketch of Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, and presents its readers with an astonishing "portrait study" of the poet Longfellow, contains the following verses, by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, entitled "A New Year Chime":—

The bells ring out, their voices swing
Upon the silent air,
With rise and fall and break and change
Of mingled praise and prayer;

Of praise that rises high and clear
On notes that upward sweep,
Of prayer that graver accent finds,
And falls to cadence deep.

As each, in size and tone apart,
Doth its own tale repeat,
And all, attuned in order, form
One harmony complete,

So we, in order true, would be
Where God would have us stand,
So we, or great or small, would do
The thing He doth demand;

Each, with the force to him allowed,
A herald of His Word,
All, in one voice of blended might,
A peal of sweet accord.

THE Rev. William Jellie, who is going out to take charge of the Unitarian Church at Auckland, New Zealand, was to sail on Friday by the s.s. Ophir, of the Orient Line. Letters posted up to Wednesday should reach Mr. Jellie at Naples, if sent under cover to Messrs. Holme and Co., the agents of the Orient Line at that port. Our cordial good wishes go with Mr. Jellie on his interesting and hopeful mission. He will have a great opportunity, and we are assured that a hearty welcome and loyal support await him at Auckland.

THE ADVENT OF THE CHRIST TO BE.

THOU comest! even so, Lord Jesus, come . . .
Oh not to claim the homage of the knee,
To make the water wine, or walk the sea . . .
But, ushering in a third millennium,
To bid the clang of clashing creeds be dumb,
And set the pinions of the spirit free,
While, in the Advent of the Christ to Be,
Chime, sweetlier chime, the bells of Christendom.

Come, to redeem us from the greed of gold!
O come, Lord Jesus, with thy new evangel:
Thy Eastern star emerges from eclipse.
Thy sheep that are not of the Church's fold,
Amid the hymn and chant of herald angel,
Await thy holier apocalypse.

(Author of "Laurel Leaves.")

THE "ESSEX HALL YEAR BOOK."*

THE new edition of the "Year Book" is the most complete and most readable that has yet been issued. Of actual additions to the contents we note a grouping of the churches under distinct societies throughout the country, following that under counties, and also an account of the new Willaston School, which is to be opened in September; but the great improvement is in larger type and more space given to the lists of ministers and congregations, and Sunday-schools, and also in other sections of the book. We specially welcome the new arrangement of the list of congregations, which runs across the pages as the book is opened, and not in the old troublesome way.

After the Editor's Preface comes rightly, in the first place, an account of the National Conference, from which the general public may know that the "Year Book" is concerned with "Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian and other Non-subscribing or kindred congregations," and the societies and educational and charitable institutions more or less directly associated with them.

The list of ministers contains 366 names, including a few laymen. Of these, 292 are in charge of congregations, 14 are employed as editors, secretaries or college tutors, 42 have retired owing to infirmity or old age. The list of congregations contains 365 places of worship, including mission-rooms and hired halls; of these, 236 are in England, 39 in Ireland, 8 in Scotland, and 32 in Wales. On Dec. 1, 1899, there were 25 vacant pulpits, and 19 ministers on the roll unattached and open to accept appointments. The Preface notes that ten new names appear on this year's roll.

It seems that the "Essex Hall Hymnal" is now the book most widely used in our churches, "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home" coming second, and "Hymns of Praise and Prayer" third, being used by 107, 75, and 72 congregations, respectively. Three hundred and twelve of the 365 places of worship have Sunday-schools attached to them.

There is now, we believe, less prejudice against Unitarians than at any previous period. Faithfulness, devotion to duty, practical insight and foresight, readiness to seize the opportunities that present themselves, and to do the work that is close at hand—these are the qualities we need to cultivate, these the aims we should set and keep before us.

So the Editor concludes his Preface, and with these words we may warmly commend the "Year Book" as invaluable to all who are interested in the welfare of our Free Churches.

BISHOP JOHN SELWYN.*

JOHN RICHARDSON SELWYN was born in 1844, during his father's episcopate in New Zealand. When ten years old, he was brought to England by his father and mother, and went to Eton, and afterwards to Trinity, Cambridge. When he was twenty-two, and was through his classical tripos, he went out to New Zealand on a visit to his parents, taking law-books with him, as he was thinking of the legal profession. But companionship with his father during a toilsome six weeks' missionary expedition "sowed the seed of a desire to be allowed to take his own share in the labour." The next year his father became Bishop of Lichfield; and John Selwyn decided to take orders, with some misgivings, it would seem, for Mr. How writes:—"He had always been a thoroughly good fellow, but he was endowed with immense spirits, and was exceptionally boyish and unconventional in his ways, so that while the prospect of being a clergyman was attractive enough to the strongly-marked serious side of his character, yet it seemed to him to require so great a change in his mode of life that, as appears in many of his letters at this date, it caused him grave apprehension." He held a short curacy at Alrewas, and then, by his father's desire, took charge for a time of St. George's, Wolverhampton, where there had been difficulties which he managed to compose.

The news of the murder of Bishop Patteson, of Melanesia, in 1871, turned Selwyn's thoughts once more in the direction of missionary work. Decision was not taken hastily. His marriage intervened; but his wife was quite willing to share his perils, and in February, 1873, they set sail for Melanesia. The study of "Mota," the recognised tongue of the Mission, was hard work on the voyage, and a severe attack of rheumatism came on, so that when he reached the scene of his labours, he had to be carried on shore as an invalid. A few months' rest set him up again, and he began his work in earnest. What strikes one all through is the genial, hearty spirit in which he did everything. He was very fond of young folks, whatever the colour of their skins, and had much comprehension of boy-nature.

In a letter written a year after his arrival, he says:—

> It is marvellous how like a boy, say up to twelve or thirteen, from the Solomon Islands is to a boy from Belgravia. In point of adaptability to circumstances I should be inclined to give the palm to the former, but qua pickle and jokes, &c., all that constitute small boy-nature, even to tears in their trousers on all occasions, &c., I don't think there is a pin to choose.

And, about the same time—

> You would like to see my evening school in a corner of my room, with my little black fellows with curly heads and black eyes and spindle shanks stretched out straight in front of them, all writing away at dictation for bare life, and as keen about their marks as can be. I try and chaff them into order as well as I can, and find it answers admirably.

Selwyn had offered himself to the work with no view of ultimately succeeding Patteson, but events naturally tended that way, and his many qualifications for the post, as well as his being the son of a missionary Bishop, pointed in the same direction. So, after the matter had been most carefully considered on all hands, he was consecrated at Nelson, New Zealand, in February, 1877, and became a "Boy Bishop." He was only thirty-three. The spirit in which he stepped to the higher office in the Church was modest and self-distrustful, but manly and earnest, as in all his work. He had shrunk from any addition to his personal authority in the Mission, and wrote to his mother a year before:—

> One is master to a very great extent now, and the very last thing that such an office requires is masterfulness. There is a quiet way of doing things which I see and envy in others, and at very rare intervals acquire myself, and then I am surprised to find out how easily things go.

But, from the day of his consecration, as he writes to his father, he stood "pledged to carry on as head the work which you and Bishop Patteson began," and there can have been no doubt in any mind except his own of his fitness for the task.

The story of the next thirteen years is a record of incessant and self-denying labour, relieved by three visits to England—the last when he was broken down in health—but saddened at the beginning by the death of his devoted wife and then of his father. In 1885, during his second visit to England to see his motherless girls and bring home his little boy, he married again, and his second wife was as loyal and fervent a helper in mission-work as the first. Selwyn never really loved his episcopal office, but to any call for help, spiritual or material, that he could render, he was always prompt to respond. He made light of the frequent attacks of illness from which he suffered, as he toiled from island to island, or on inland journeys, at his work. He is the friend of everybody; but the children always seem to have the first place in his regard. The thought of his own little ones at home sends a look of love into his eyes, which wins the little darkies of the Pacific islands. Quick of temper sometimes, he learnt self-control. There is a charming story on pp. 175 and 176 of a lad from one of the wilder islands who struck him in the face, and subsequently relapsed into heathen ways. Years afterwards another missionary was called to see the man, who lay dying, and wished to be baptised. "Call me John Selwyn," he said, "because he taught me what Christ was like that day when I struck him, and I saw the colour mount to his face, but he never said a word except of love afterwards."

But there was work requiring courage and tact, as well as gentleness and self-control; and Selwyn was equal to the need. In 1880 he established a footing in Santa Cruz, where Patteson had been murdered nine years before. In the following year he "brought to a successful conclusion another difficult, dangerous, and delicate business. This was nothing less than landing at Florida to induce the chiefs of the tribes implicated to give up the murderers of Lieutenant Bower and his boat's crew. He was probably the only man who could have done this, and his action no doubt saved the whole of the Florida Islanders from war." There must have been something commanding about him. "I don't like the look of that chap's eye," was the remark of a rowdy undergraduate, when, some years later, Selwyn began at Cambridge the last work of his life.

The strain of missionary toil told eventually too heavily upon him, and he finally returned to England, an invalid and a cripple, in 1891. Two years later, though still a cripple, he was sufficiently restored to health to yield to the request which was pressed upon him that he would succeed the Hon. Arthur Lyttleton (now Bishop Suffragan of Southampton) as Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge, which had been founded in 1882 in memory of his father, Bishop Selwyn, of New Zealand and Lichfield. Selwyn College, like Keble College at Oxford, was established to give a somewhat less costly education than the other Colleges, and on strictly Church of England lines. Here also, though he was not in all points cut out for College Headship, and had, indeed, "roared with laughter" when the proposal was first made to him, John Selwyn did good work of many kinds until his death at the beginning of last year.

Mr. How's simple but effective memoir is a book to read and treasure. We are allowed to know something of the sources of Selwyn's strength—his devotion to his mother, his high sense of duty, his prayerfulness, his trust in God. All who knew him seem to have loved him, and mourned his loss. What better testimony to a man's worth can there be than that?

DENDY AGATE.

To the above notice of Bishop Selwyn we are glad to be able to add these notes of personal reminiscence by a lady:—

On Aug. 5, 1891, I came on board the Ballaarat at Adelaide. I was much tired, and suffering severely from acute nervous headache. In the evening, as I was lying in my berth, feeling very forlorn and helpless, the curtain across my door was pulled on one side, and I heard a gentle voice asking if its owner might come in and see me. It was Mrs. Selwyn, who had heard from the stewardess that I was not well, and had come to see if she could do anything to help me. Her husband was ill, and she had two little children to care for, and she knew nothing of me but that I was alone. That was my introduction to a companionship for which I shall be grateful always. We were not a large party on the Ballaarat. Bishop Selwyn's group was the most important in every way. Besides himself and his wife there were the two children, the elder, Dorothy, a fascinating little girl of three, who was soon called "the ship's child"; always good, inheriting from father and mother a sweet unselfishness, she was a source of pleasure to everyone on board. Then there was Dr. Welchmann, the kindest and most companionable of men, and little C. M. whom he was bringing home from Fiji to his friends in England.

The Bishop lay all day on a couch on deck, and there centred all the interest of the voyage. He could not let anyone pass without kindly notice; everybody seemed to him to be worth knowing and helping, and Mrs. Selwyn told me he would like to speak to me. But we had a number of young officers on board going back to India from Australia, and some of these were always about him, listening to all he had to say, discussing, I believe, military as well as other matters with him. "He would have made such a splendid soldier," one of them said to me. One day, however, I passed and for the moment he was alone; his newspaper had slipped from his hand, and I ventured to pick it up for him. He thanked me and said: "Why do you not come and talk to me?" "I can't, Bishop," said I. "I should like to, but there are always so many wanting you." "Never mind," said he, "next time you feel like it, catch my eye and I'll send the other fellow away."

A few days later Mrs. Selwyn asked me if I would have my dinner on deck with the Bishop. I have been asked to put on paper what I remember of him, and now I find I cannot write particulars of what I care for most of all—the tender sympathy, the generous breadth of mind, the wonderful comprehension that made him understand the sorrows and difficulties and weaknesses of others, no matter how far they were removed from his own character. He was so strong—strong enough to be patient with those who were weak. I think it is not usual to find such strength of will and conscience combined with such strength of body. It impressed me more than I can say to see the strong man, still so obviously delighting in every manifestation of strength in others, absolutely debarred from taking any physical exercise, and yet ruling himself so completely that no one ever heard him murmur or found him otherwise than cheerful.

He had a ready pen for a verse, and any little event that broke the monotony of our voyage was promptly made the subject of a rhyme by him; some of these rhymes were playful attacks on our chief, who used to bring them to me to be answered, and this wordy warfare was, I think, a source of amusement to us all. I have by me as I write a copy of verses "from Dorothy to M. D." written on paper with the Norfolk Island address, dated Ballaarat, Sept. 6, '91, and signed with the Bishop's initials.

We parted with most of our young men at Colombo, and a night or two before they left us they were amusing themselves with a "sing-song" on the hurricane deck. Naturally it was a little noisy, and the (on board ship) inevitable middle-aged female was found to complain and interfere to have it stopped. Stopped it was, and great was the indignation of the performers until it occurred to some one to remember that the Bishop's couch was just below the piano. At once he ran down and said: "Bishop, we would not have done it for anything if we had thought it would annoy you."

"My dear fellow," was the answer. "I haven't enjoyed anything so much since I came on board."

One soldier, no longer young, one who had seen warfare, broke down in saying good-bye to the Bishop. This man said to me, enviously: "You are privileged to be spending another fortnight on the same ship with him."

Indeed I was privileged. Now and then I had long quiet talks with Mrs. Selwyn, and heard the history of the life on Norfolk Island, of the Bishop's long illness, and of the weary time when she also was ill, and the hardest thing to bear was that she could not go to him and nurse him. She told me of his voyages in the Southern Cross, and how they never said good-bye to each other without remembering that it might be for always, so far as this life is concerned. I was ashamed, in learning to know such quiet heroism as his and hers, to think how much I grieved myself.

The stewards asked him to preach to them on Saturday afternoon, which was, I understood, their rest-time. So he was carried forward to hold a service for them, and they, like everyone else on board, were the better for having known him. After all, though, I think it was not so much the words he said and the advice he gave that helped, as his personality. I never met anyone who more strongly exemplified the responsibility that is laid upon us to be good because of the effect our characters have upon those with whom we come in contact. I have often thought that the lives of Bishop and Mrs. Selwyn would have been well worth living if it had only been for the good they did on board the Ballaarat, and those few weeks were such a small part of the beautiful whole. Not that they gave the impression that they were trying to improve people; it was only evident that they wanted to help and comfort everybody. It was a great rest to be with them.

That last night on board, when the Bishop came to dine with us for the first time, we were nearly through dinner when his daughters came on board. We outsiders rose and left the saloon as soon as we realised who they were, and I think there was not a dry eye amongst us. I saw the Bishop once more in London. After that I never had the chance of meeting him again, though, until his death, I always hoped I might do so. I think the portrait in Mr. How's book hardly does him justice. I might have thought that the charm he had for me was due to his helping me when I needed help, but I could not but see that it was the same for all. He had the "enthusiasm of humanity," and all human beings felt it in his presence. M. D.

Two characteristic incidents I must add. I had been repining that I was not strong enough to do what I would. "Do not worry about the work," said the Bishop. "Do you not think, if God intends the work to be done, He will find someone to do it, no matter what becomes of you?" The other incident shows his keen sense of the ludicrous, and has reference to the well-known superstition of sailors that a clergyman on board was unlucky. He made the captain draw up and sign a certificate that the Ballaarat had made a good passage, though he was on board. I remember our agreeing that this might be because there was another Bishop on board (Bishop Barlow), on the same principle as that two negatives make an affirmative.

THE HELPER.*

MISS PRITCHARD is to be congratulated on the completion of a third annual volume of The Helper, which has this year a special interest and value, in that it contains a full record of the Summer Session of Sunday-school Teachers held at Manchester College, Oxford, last July. In this section of the volume alone (nearly two-thirds of the whole) there is abundant material for a year's study, whether the teacher's field of duty is at school or in the home. The practical lectures and discussions on methods of teaching and the aims and ideals of Sunday-school work were of the highest value, and we trust that the Editor's suggestion as to Winter Reading Circles, on p. 233, will be widely followed. Miss Pritchard points out how much would be gained if in each school during the season the teachers would organise four meetings to discuss the four lectures—(1) "Object in Sunday-school Teaching," by the Rev. J. J. Wright; (2) "Methods of the Day School and their Application to Sunday-school," by Mr. Frank Taylor, of Stourbridge; (3) "Discipline," by the Rev. Henry Rawlings; and (4) "Method of Preparing and Presenting a Lesson," by Miss Edith Drummond. To these should certainly be added Miss Pritchard's own lecture on "What Can We Teach and How?" And not less fruitful in suggestion were the Rev. Joseph Wood's lecture on "How to Give a Bible Lesson," and the Rev. Joseph Freeston's on "Religious Lessons from Natural Objects." Then for the self-culture of teachers a most interesting and stimulating subject for a reading circle is provided by Dr. Drummond's lecture on "The Life and Teachings of the Apostle Paul," with which, and the Epistles themselves, should be studied Dr. Drummond's little book on "The Epistle to the Galatians," if not his larger commentary, just published, as one of Dr. Orello Cone's "International Handbooks to the New Testament." The other lectures at the Summer Session by professors of the College, Mr. Upton's on "Ethics in its Relation with Religion," Mr. Carpenter's on "How the Old Testament grew," and Mr. Odgers' on "The Development of Liberal Nonconformity," are also reproduced in full abstract in The Helper, and also Mr. Lucking Tavener's interesting lecture on "The Work and Teaching of G. F. Watts, R.A." As full-page illustrations, Mr. Watts's unfinished statue of "Energy" and a charming view of Manchester College are given.

To the other third of the volume a no less hearty welcome must be accorded. Many small children and their elders will be grateful to Miss Mary Dendy for a second part of her story of "Nellie and John Henry and Eliza," while among other contributions may be noted an admirable New Year's Address by the Rev. John Byles, a paper on "The Sunday-school, its Past, Present, and Future," by Dr. L. de Beaumont Klein, a paper on "The Sunday-school as Training Ground for Principles of Good Citizenship," by Mr. J. Wigley, and four brief lessons for elder classes on "The Parable of the Sower," by the Rev. Frank Walters.

The most substantial contribution, which cannot fail to be of great service, is a "Year of Sunday Readings," arranged by Mr. H. Kelsey White. There are fifty-two readings, each complete in itself, which might be used to great advantage with the oldest classes, either as readings to make their own impression, or as the subjects for teaching. The least inspiring is perhaps that chosen for the New Year's Sunday, from Ecclesiastes iii. 1—17, 22; we would far rather have had Ecclesiasticus ii., which is not used, or Proverbs iii., or some of the Psalms. On the other hand, the readings close with Tennyson's immortal lines, "Ring out, wild bells," and in the course of the year there is a great variety of helpful readings, both in prose and verse. Wordsworth, Browning, Keble, Longfellow, Emerson, Whittier, and Lowell are among the poets brought under contribution, while, in addition to Biblical selections, there are passages from the "Imitation of Christ," Bunyan, William Law, and such modern writers as Dickens, Smiles, Gannett, and Beatrice Harraden. The volume is well worth having, were it for this cycle of readings alone, and with all its other riches should be sure of a very wide acceptance, both in school and home.

* The Helper: A Handbook for Sunday-school Teachers and Parents. 1900. Edited by Marian Pritchard ("Aunt Amy"). Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 2s. 6d. net.

GEMS OF VERSE.*

WHEN all thy soul with city dust is dry,
Seek some green spot where a brook
tinkles by:
But, if thy lot deny thee nook and brook,
Turn to green thoughts in a fresh leafy book.

So writes the Rev. Frederick Langbridge, rector of St. John's, Limerick, and formerly of Merton College, Oxford, the author of these two delightful little collections of verse. By chance we came upon a verse of his, and knew at once that he must have written things worthy of attention.

God sends great angels in our sore dismay,
But little ones go in and out all day.

Mr. Langbridge, we learn from Who's Who, has written other, and very likely larger, books of poetry; with these we have as yet no acquaintance, and are content for the present to enjoy the little gems of verse gathered up in these two collections of forty-eight pages each. A few of the pieces fill a whole page, but mostly they are couplets or of four lines only. "The thoughts in this little book," says the author in the Preface to "Little Tapers," "are packed as close as my skill could contrive. I hope the memory may carry them easily." Certainly that skilful packing arrests attention, and even more a certain quaintness and old world tone, as of George Herbert, in many of the verses, which we do not remember to have met with in so happy a measure in any other recent writer, unless it be Henry Sutton. And often the headings of the verse add a fresh charm. They can claim, says the author, "no proverbial sanction, but are pegs of my own turning. Sometimes they are condensations of the verses that they introduce. More frequently they give the thought a new twist." Here are some examples:—

Short cuts are Long.
Seeker for peace, this on thy heart I lay:—
Trust thou no short-cut; fare by God's long way.

Half-way and All-the-Way.
First find thyself: 'tis half-way house to God:
Then lose thyself, and all the road is trod.

Find a Bough, and God will find a Bird.
Fence thou from off the dinning street
A little realm of pastoral air;
Keep but a green bough for his feet,
And God will send a blackbird there.

Sin hath a Sin on either Arm.
Who knocks so loud?—"A little lonely sin."
"Slip through," we answer, and all Hell is in.

Kind Master, merry Man.
Servants of God, why go ye hollow-eyed?
Is not His wage secured, His board supplied?
Ye shame your Master with your grievous face,
Hinting that Satan's were the better place.

We might go on to quote verse after verse, expressive of the author's delight in beautiful things, the healing influence of Nature and its divine significance, the sacredness of the lowly, common things of life; but we have already fulfilled our purpose, in showing our readers what rich treasure of the deeper life they will find in these little books. Two other verses, however, we must quote, and first one good for theologians to ponder:—

Leave no Points pricking when you pin your Creed.
God save our faith from that schismatic heart
That snaps at others' creed its "There we part."
God grant us charity, whose thoughts are sweet,
And ripen difference to, "There we meet!"

And in conclusion this other verse, with cordial expression of our gratitude to Mr. Langbridge:—

Good is eternal: gentle deeds
Pass on, but never die:
And loving thoughts are patient seeds
Of immortality.

NOTES ON SOME ECCLESIASTICAL MOVEMENTS IN AUSTRALIA.

WITHIN the last few weeks some notable events have transpired in some of the ecclesiastical assemblies in Australia. The Presbyterian General Assembly and the Baptist Union meet at the same time, and a comparison of the work of the two is inevitable. The Baptist Union appears to have been "marking time," as "the membership of the churches . . . is the same as last year." The public questions discussed were mostly of a local nature and interest. But with a view to federating the unions of the several colonies, the consideration of a uniform ministerial standard for the whole Church acquired importance, and will, I doubt not, be carried through. As in England, so also here, a twentieth century fund is taking practical shape, and is likely to be carried through successfully by the Baptists and the Presbyterians. The alienation of the people from the church was dwelt upon, and it was stated, on the authority of Dr. Campbell, that there are 250,000 people in Melbourne alone who never go to church—probably an underestimate. But in this I imagine Australia is not peculiar, though its sparse population renders it the more noticeable.

The Federation of the Baptist Unions has not involved any fundamental dogmatic considerations as the Federal Union of the Presbyterian Church has. This Union is to be consummated on the distinct understanding that the "secondary standards" of the Church are to be revised, but a minority of one-fifth of the congregations who may object to the revision will be entitled to keep their churches, manses, &c.; a minority of less than one-fifth who refuse "to acquiesce in any adopted change of the basis of union shall have their property subject to the control of the National Assembly, and that Assembly will have power to deal with it as may seem fit to it, meet and equitable."

Dr. Rentoul, who has been hitherto the evil genius of the Presbyterian Church, has effected a complete change of front. Less than a twelvemonth ago he figured in a noted heresy hunt as the champion of the Westminster Confession; now he denounces it heartily, and sought to carry a motion in the Assembly to proceed to revision of the standard before the Act of Union is consummated. If the Church is consistent it must prefer a charge of heresy against the doctor. The general result of the Assembly's proceedings is disappointing, but allowance must be made for the difficulties of the situation, and full credit given to it for the frank admission of the failure of its standards, and an honourable attempt to bring about a better state of things. But there is no indication of a desire to avoid the ancient error by adopting a non-dogmatic basis of union—the revised basis will simply perpetuate the error of the old and unrevised confession. So, after all, the cause of progress is not much benefited.

The Church of England has had some lively discussions of late, and its finances—at any rate in Victoria—are not very flourishing. But a most important suggestion has been made by the Dean of Perth, which is likely to have far-reaching consequences if it be carried, as sooner or later it must be. The proposal is to change its name into the "Church of Auttralia." Here is the motion:—

That this synod, while affirming its deep and unalterable attachment to the mother Church of England, her teachings and principles, considers that the time has arrived when it is essential that such alteration in the name and the title of the Church in Australia should be made as will serve to identify it more closely than that of the Church of England can do with the history, development, and national life of this continent, and prevent it from seeming to future generations to be exotic in character and sentiment; that a general synod be respectfully requested to take such steps as may be necessary to give effect to the above resolution.

The difficulties are obvious, but such as may be overcome.

The movement I started in Prahran some five months since continues to make satisfactory progress, and has acquired a definite organisation and holds regular weekly meetings. The inaugural meeting was held on the 13th of this month and was successful. The Age, the leading Liberal daily, published a highly favourable leader on the movement in its issue of the 20th.

I was delighted to hear that the Rev. W. Jellie is to take charge of the Church in Auckland. I gather from a private letter, just received, that our friends there are preparing a "right royal welcome" for him. I am sure Mr. Jellie will have many loyal supporters and earnest helpers in any work he may initiate. By the same mail comes the news of the death of the first Chairman of Committee at Auckland, Mr. E. R. Shawcross, who passed away a few days ago at Cambridge, Waikato. Both Mr. and Mrs. Shawcross come from Dean Row, and their many friends in the north of England will learn of his decease with very sincere regret.

I was sorry to see that the Rev. George Walters cavils at one or two statements of mine in my letters to The Inquirer. I can only repeat that the statements were and are true, and Mr. Walters cannot deny them. I am glad, of course, to learn how good an opinion Mr. Walters has of himself and have no wish to disturb that opinion. If he desires to elevate a difference of opinion as to a matter of fact into a personal grievance, I cannot help it. The animus, if there be animus, lies in the fact, not consciously in myself. That Mr. Walters has such a very bad opinion of the Unitarian Church of Australia is a matter of sincere regret. But seeing that he, more than any other man, has had the making of its recent history, it must be allowed to be a little surprising. In August, 1898, Mr. Walters wrote thus to a Melbourne paper:—"My personal action is not prompted by anything like enmity to the Unitarian Church as that Church is known generally in Great Britain, America, and Australia." But according to his last letter in The Inquirer, Australia was surely included by inadvertance! Certainly it is a little too absurd to quarrel across 12,000 miles of ocean; and I must decline to be a party to it. As to a standing feud between myself and Dr. Strong and Mr. Walters, the idea is preposterous. Certain statements were made in the Australian Herald about Unitarianism which seemed to me misleading and calculated to foster that spirit of bigotry which is so injurious both to the Unitarian and the Australian Church, and I expressed that opinion frankly but not uncharitably. Were the same statements to be repeated, I should feel it my duty to repeat my protest in identical terms. The ideal of Catholicity set forth in the Australian Church is very beautiful, but is grounded upon a "basis of Union," which, however broad, is still a "test"; whereas the Unitarian Church, as I understand it, allows of no test whatsoever, and seeks Catholicity amidst diversity. Let each go its own way and do its own work; there is room for both.

LETTER FROM BRUSSELS.

We have delayed our usual appeal to our English friends for several reasons, one of which makes it useless to give the others: we had hoped that circumstances would allow us to dispense with the appeal. But they do not.

Strange to say, we are rich and yet very poor. We are somewhat like the man in the desert who was suffering from hunger and thirst in spite of the bag of diamonds he was carrying with him.

After having lost the first action it had brought against us, the town of Brussels found itself legally obliged to pay us all the sums due for the minister's house-rent since the date of our legal recognition—May 1, 1888, making a total of £512. But the town only paid the money under protest, as it had already, before the close of the first action, introduced a second. We had hoped that it would abandon this second action, the grounds of which were certainly very weak judicially. Instead of that, it has commenced a third one, which it has joined to the second one, claiming the restitution to the town of the sum we have received with the legal interest at 4½ per cent. The town will, no doubt, carry this action, like the first, through the three degrees of jurisdiction. A judge of the Highest Court, the Court of Cassation, who is a faithful member of our church and a most regular attendant at our services, and whose son is one of our counsel, tells me we must expect this new law-suit to last at least three years! During all which time we cannot touch one farthing of the sum we have received and invested, nor of the interest; and if we had the misfortune to lose, we should be called upon to refund the whole. Our first success gives us strong hopes and chances of winning, but litigation is always precarious.

This, then, is at present our financial position. We began the year with a deficiency of £38 8s. 11½d. The expenses will amount to £214 8s. Up to the present we have received £156 8s. All subscriptions being paid, we have nothing more to expect besides the offertories of the three last Sundays of the year, an amount of a few francs. We would, therefore, need a sum of nearly £58 to meet our expenses, or of £96 in order to cover the deficienty of 1898 also.

I know this is a very bad time for an appeal, but I venture to hope that our English friends will not forget us in their Christmas liberalities. From those who cannot do more, we will be very thankful for small donations: les petits ruisseaux font les grandes rivières, says the French proverb.

I make this appeal with all the more confidence that, as I said at the anniversary meetings, we have never felt more hopeful of final success than at present. We have good reason to believe that our eighteen years of labour in the cause of Liberal Christianity in Belgium will before very long obtain their recompense. Our influence upon the general public is growing; even our orthodox brethren have ceased to ostracise the minister; after having been excluded from everything since his resignation nineteen years ago, he has since last June been asked to give, and has given, lectures in three Protestant churches.

Our congregation this winter has been very encouraging in spite of the dancing hall in which we meet. Several of our leading members are making it a point to attend our services as often as possible in order to impress casual hearers favourably. Though the majority of our people—not all, however—being Belgians, differ from the minister with regard to the British policy in the Transvaal, yet no unpleasantness has arisen either in Brussels or Ghent, and we have all kept well together. Our membership has not yet increased much, as we have had an unusual number of deaths, but there are several inquirers, and a group of five or six young men of the employés class have been attending very regularly for several Sundays.

It seems really as if only an impulsion were necessary to create an important movement, and, perhaps, that impulsion may come from France. On Oct. 7 last, M. Yves Guyot, director of the Siècle, published a very remarkable article on the necessity of religious competition. He begged his readers to give their serious attention to the question whether Protestantism would not offer them the means of reconciling their religious sentiments with their aspirations after political liberty. This article attracted a great deal of notice. Among others, I wrote to M. Yves Guyot, applauding his courageous initiative and offering to help by giving information about Liberal Protestantism to all who, in compliance with M. Guyot's advice, wished to reconsider their religious position. I have received about thirty answers, all favourable with one exception. Several were very interesting, those from schoolmasters particularly so. "Born a Catholic," writes one, "but having long ago abandoned all religious worship without having become irreligious, I hope to find in Liberal Protestantism the solution of my perplexities." "I was born a Catholic," writes another, "my wife also, and have lived to the age of twenty-five rejecting all the trash with which my first religious education had been overburdened, yet not able to find my way and distinguish between Catholicism and Christianity for want of an initiator. . . . . A Bible like that of Reuss ought to be found in all school libraries, but that is a thing which can only be achieved by private generosity." "In Liberal Protestantism," writes a third, "I see the religion of the future. I should like to awaken an interest in that high question among my fellow-labourers who seem already alienated in spirit and in heart from Catholicism, which it is our duty to replace by a purer religion." A fourth writes that convinced of the absurdity of Catholicism, he has already sought an interview with a Protestant pastor, but found his doctrine too encumbered with fossils, and hopes to find something superior in Liberal Christianity. A lady writes that belonging to a Catholic family, but with liberal views, she wishes, together with her children, to study religious questions with more intelligence, freedom of mind and good faith than they have done up to the present.

I have, of course, answered all these correspondents, and several have answered back: one asking me if I knew of any Liberal Protestant Church in his neighbourhood which he might join; another, a young schoolmistress, thanking me specially for my lecture against Atheism, which had done her good, as her faith in God had been shaken with her other beliefs; another, a lady, telling me she is doing what she can to get the free-thinking society of her town to come over to Liberal Protestantism. But I must really stop. Will not our English friends think that these are all hopeful signs? Signs that before very long we may be able to say to them: "Your kind assistance has not been vain: see the harvest you have helped us to reap."

OBITUARY.

MISS SARAH JANE LEWIN.

MISS SARAH JANE LEWIN died at Oxton, Birkenhead, on Dec. 27, aged seventy-seven years. She was the youngest daughter of the late Mr. Edmund Lewin, a merchant of Liverpool, well-known and respected in his day, and the granddaughter of the late Rev. Robert Lewin, of Benn's-garden and Renshaw-street Chapels. She was educated at Bristol, under the care of the Carpenters, Miss Mary Carpenter being her instructor in Latin and Greek. On her return to Liverpool she attended Dr. Martineau's classes for moral philosophy and mathematics. Thenceforward for many years, until he left Liverpool, she was much under the stimulating and inspiring influence of this great teacher. Another influence on her life was that of Emerson, whose lectures on "Representative Men" she heard when he delivered them in Liverpool. At Paradise-street Chapel, and afterwards at Hope-street Church, she was very actively engaged in Sunday and day-school work, and district visiting. She had a happy faculty for attracting and interesting young people, and the influence she exercised on her Sunday-school scholars was great and lasting. The deep affection she inspired in them was manifested to the last days of her life, in kindly and sympathetic attentions. Her mind was progressive and independent, she was deeply interested in new ideas and in social progress; and humanitarian movements had her keenest sympathy. Her love for animals was intense. Not less passionate was her love for plants and flowers. Perhaps her very happiest hours were spent in her garden, where labour to her was never toilsome. Between two and three years before her death she was seized with almost the first serious illness she had ever experienced; and although she partly recovered, it left her comparatively helpless. Yet the unfailing care of her eldest and only surviving sister, Miss Mary A. Lewin—her life-long companion—made these last years very happy ones to her. The Christmas time before she died had been brightened by tokens of remembrance from her many friends. She passed away in her sleep, a serene ending to her long and active life. W. L.

LADY MARTINEAU.

WE have to record with great regret the death, at Birmingham, of Lady Martineau, early on Wednesday morning, Dec. 27. For many years she had been in delicate health, but until twenty-four hours before her death her friends did not apprehend any danger from the chill she had taken a few days before. The immediate cause of death arose from failure of the heart, following on pneumonia.

Lady Martineau was the eldest daughter of the late Timothy Kenrick, and was born at Maple Bank, Edgbaston. She was one of a large family of sisters, one of whom married the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P.; another, his brother, Mr. Arthur Chamberlain; a third, the present Lord Mayor of Birmingham, Mr. C. G. Beale; and a fourth Mr. Henry Osler. As the wife of Sir Thomas Martineau, Lady Martineau took an active part in the affairs of the town during the three busy years of Sir Thomas's mayoralty, and by her grace, courtesy and consideration for others won universal regard. She was a devoted disciple of Liberal Christianity, and a most loyal and generous member of the Old Meeting Church, where she will be greatly missed. Combined with a sweet, frank, and simple disposition, she had "the reason firm, the temperate will," which made her a force and influence for good wherever she went, although cut off by bodily weakness from many of the active duties of life.

The funeral took place on Saturday, Dec. 30, the first part being conducted at her house, West Hill, Edgbaston, by the Rev. Joseph Wood. At the grave, Key Hill Cemetery, the committal sentences were read. The funeral was quite private, only the members of the Kenrick, Martineau and Chamberlain families being present. A deputation from the Old Meeting Church attended at the cemetery.

Lady Martineau was sixty-one years of age, and left behind her two children, Mr. Ernest and Miss Clara Martineau.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A YOUNG girl, on going to bed one night, took down a book from the little shelf in her bedroom, to read a few words before going to sleep. The book opened at these words: "To-morrow morning, if you choose to take up a spirit of such power, you may rise like a soul without a past, fresh for the future as an Adam untempted yet; disengaged from the manifold coil of willing usage, and with every link of guilty habit shaken off. I know, indeed, that you will not; that no man ever will; but the hindrance is with yourself alone. The coming hours are open yet, pure and spotless receptacles for whatever you may deposit there; pledged to no evil, secure of no good; neither mortgaged to greedy passion, nor given to generous toil. . . . Let us start up and live; here come the moments which cannot be had again; some few may yet be filled with imperishable good."

All this came like a flash. "To-morrow morning?" Why not? Leave all bad habits, bad thoughts, bad tempers behind, and begin quite afresh—a New Year, with new lives, and new and refreshed hearts. No more idleness; no more crossness; no more slow obedience or disobedience; no more selfishness; no more greediness; no more cowardice! How it all crowded before her, and how she saw it all, as she lay thinking! Kindness to the little ones, thoughtfulness to the elders, especially parents; self-sacrifice always and for all, great and small; that is what it means.

Is it too much? Is not this what we are made for? And did Jesus think it too much when he said, "Be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect." And if this is so, shall we not throw ourselves into the work, with all our strength, and with hope in God for help—casting no look behind? "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." That is a prayer to carry in our hearts every day and hour, and it will help us to rise to this new life of the New Year.

But we shall need to be always on the watch, else the old faults and sins will lie in wait and slip in upon us again. The daily lives of most of us are chiefly made up of quite little things, and we think these little things don't matter. But he that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much; and it is just the little things which practice us for the greater deeds.

Things will suggest themselves to those who are really in earnest. Words are little things, but what a difference it often makes whether just one or two little words are spoken, or whether the lips are kept resolutely shut and they are not spoken. Even in such a small matter as doing things at once, a prompt spirit makes such a difference. A mother asked her little girl to fetch her some more cotton for her work, from upstairs. "Yes, mother," she said, but went on reading her book. After a time her mother said, "Emily," she started, a little ashamed, and got up and was just finishing a sentence when she became aware of a little figure crossing the room to the door; she flung down her book—there came a rush, a bang, and she and her little sister pounded together against the door. "Go away," said Emily. "Why don't you go then?" said the little one. But Emily had gone then.

To do all these little things with all your might needs a great deal of courage and self-sacrifice; but shall we fail because of that? Can we be "good soldiers" and not be ready and alert for these things? And who knows at what moment a call may come for greater things? Did you see in the paper the other day that a workman came home late from work, and was just going to have a basin of soup when he saw that there was a fire at a place near, where he remembered that there were twenty horses stabled. He left his soup, and ran out, and saved all the twenty horses. He was ready even to lay down his life, at a moment's notice; and how many of our brave soldiers and sailors have shown us lately most noble examples of such heroism and self-sacrifice.

I think there is more than enough to think of, in what I have said, for the bright New Year beginning for you, children. May it be a good and bright and happy one for you all, and leave you a good many steps higher on the long climb upwards than where it found you at the beginning!

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

THROUGH love to light! Oh, wonderful the way
That leads from darkness to the perfect day!
From darkness and from sorrow of the night
To morning that comes singing o'er the sea.
Through love to light! through light, O God, to Thee,
Who art the love of love, the eternal light of light!—Richard Watson Gilder.

LONDON, DECEMBER 6, 1900.

THE NEW YEAR'S BURDEN.

THE natural rejoicing of the Christmas festival was clouded for us by grave national anxieties and the sense of an overshadowing sorrow resting on many homes; and so the New Year has come, not with the accustomed eagerness of hope and joyful pressing forward of a faith quickened by the holy memories, the generous sympathies, the sacred communion of the past days, it has come with a burden of care, which must be borne with steadfast courage, and with seriousness of purpose, to face the heavy responsibilities now laid upon our country.

As we look forward into the New Year, with earnest desire to help in the endeavour to strengthen faith, to minister to the deepening of religious life in our churches, to touch the Christian sympathies of all who worship in our fellowship or hear our word to finer issues, we are conscious of this over-mastering thought, that there is here one essential duty laid upon us all. There may be, and indeed are, acute differences of judgment as to the justice or injustice of the disastrous war in which our country is engaged in South Africa, and as to the causes which have led to so great a calamity, and it has been urged upon us that, such being the case, we ought to be silent, and not allow such controversial matters to be introduced into these columns, lest it stir up strife in our churches. But we dare not be silent, and we have not so little faith in our people as to think that any considerable number of them would wish us to be so. We will not degrade our religion by letting it be supposed that we, as worshippers of the GOD of Righteousness, the GOD of all the nations of the earth, are not directly concerned in this matter, or can forget it in the hour of prayer—that we are not solemnly called to face our responsibility as free men and citizens of a great nation.

The unity of our religious life will not be preserved by any such ignoring of great public questions. The war is only one instance, though at present most urgently pressed upon us, of such questions, which we are from time to time reproached from touching. Questions of social reform, of total abstinence and temperance legislation, of the moral aspects of vivisection, and others which are the subjects of acute discussion, and might at any time become questions of practical politics, have received from some of our friends a like treatment, and the dread of bringing discord and losing support has been held up before us, if we persist in dealing with them. But our appeal is to a nobler spirit of religious earnestness. In such a community as ours differences of judgment naturally arise, and are a healthy sign of intellectual and moral activity, which is a first condition of progress. We ought not to be afraid of such differences or of the most vigorous discussion, if only it is maintained upon the right level. Religion with us, unless it is to be a mockery, must cover the whole of life, and in the most vital sense it must be concerned with public questions in which moral issues are involved. What we have to fear and avoid as fatal to right judgment and true unity is the bitterness of an ungenerous spirit and the perversity of overbearing pride. We must grapple with the moral problems of our day, not as self-seekers or as eager for personal triumph either in debate or in policy, but as single-hearted servants of righteousness in the difficult paths of moral discipline, with mutual respect and consideration amid inevitable differences, and in constant loyalty to that charity which is greatest of all.

Then we shall be brought to a deeper sense of unity as one people, called of GOD to earnest service, strenuously grappling with the real problems of life. And as we are thus surrendered to a common purpose, looking to the one Source of inspiration and strength, though led sometimes in different paths of intellectual and moral apprehension, there will be also a new spirit in our worship, not to separate, but to draw into closer fellowship. Because we are in earnest in our life we shall pray the more earnestly, and be drawn nearer to one another the more complete our surrender to the living GOD.

Such at least is the faith in which we accept the trust of our free religious life, and with which, in renewed consecration, we would enter this New Year. We cannot be heedless of the special burden laid upon our country in these days; but for that very reason we must seek for the renewal of our deeper life, for the fresh insight of a loyal Christian discipleship, for worship that shall quicken the springs of pure love and the truest heroism and self-sacrifice, for prayer that shall be uplifted in the strength of the Eternal and direct and control the whole purpose of our life. We have each our personal responsibility, and our churches have their calling of GOD. They have, as we believe, a special work in these days, as homes of spiritual freedom for seekers after truth and citizens devoted not to selfish interests, but to the supreme interest of the Kingdom of GOD. In self-forgetfulness, in the union of prayer and brotherly love and devoted service of the needs of our fellowmen, in the face of iniquity, of poverty and suffering, of vice and degradation, we shall find our true life with GOD; our testimony to CHRIST and the power of his truth, must be in steadfast Christian faithfulness in daily life, as one people, as children of the heavenly FATHER—if only we may be found worthy, that by His grace such true life may come to us with glorious quickening and the joy that shall triumph over all the darkness and the sorrows of the world.

A NEW YEAR HYMN.

We know not what the days may bring
That open with the year,
We can but pray for power to sing
With faith undimmed by fear:

To sing a hymn of trust in Thee,
O good and loving One,
That Thou wilt to Thy children be
An ever-shining Sun.

Though clouds may darken all our way
With pain, and tears, and sin,
Yet even through the saddest day
Thy light will shine within.

Teach us to know Thy love, O God,
And trust Thy gracious power
Through every chastening of Thy rod,
And every weary hour.

Now take and use us, Lord of Love,
Through all the days to come,
Till we behold Thy face above,
In our eternal home. E. D.

Jan. 1st.

GREAT things, great opportunities of serving God, come but rarely, whereas little things whereby our faithfulness is proved, occur perpetually. If you wait for some great thing wherein to show your love to God, you may perchance wait all your life. Besides, great undertakings require great strength, and how can you be sure that you are capable of any such, if you have not been trained and proved by that which is less? Great works imply proportionately great grace, but God does not give His extraordinary gifts of grace save to those who have made good use of His lesser graces. Be sure that if you do your very best in that which is laid upon you daily, you will not be left without sufficient help when some wieghtier occasion arises.—Hidden Life of the Soul.

THE PULPIT.

NEW YEAR'S SERMON.

BY THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

Consecrate yourselves to God, all ye youths and maidens,
Ere the world benumb your fresh feeling or sin harden your conscience;
Know that others have found God, as ye have not yet found him;
But seek ye after Him, and ye shall find Him also.
—F. W. NEWMAN, "Hebrew Theism."

FOR many years I have on New Year's Sunday or the previous Sunday read for one of the Lessons in public worship those lofty lines from which I now select this text or motto. And on the New Year's Sunday, too, I have usually felt drawn to speak chiefly to the younger people who might be present at our worship, and to ask them to look with me at the solemnity and beauty and worth and profound significance of life as it stretches out before them as yet unspent, as a tale that is not yet told. Nor need we count youth by any particular number of years that have been past—eighteen, or twenty, or twenty-five; but rather by youthfulness of heart and freshness of soul. If in any human heart the main look is a forward look and not a backward, and the main emotion hope, and neither care nor fear, then the precious gift of youth has not yet been taken away or lost in the sad, fierce conflict of daily life.

It is, however, to those actually young in years that Newman addresses his adjuration, to those in whom the slow wearing years have not yet had time to benumb the fresh feeling, in whom the sin of the worldly mind has not yet had opportunity to deaden conscience; to whom also, on the other hand, not yet has life rendered such rich experience that they can know God in the deep way in which the old who have loved Him all their lives have learnt to know Him; it is to these that the old man retired alike from the strifes and the honours of the world, called across the vale of the years,

Consecrate yourselves to God, all ye youths and maidens!
Seek ye after God, and ye shall find Him also.

What a wonderful heritage this is on which the young men and the young women look out, this heritage of life! How easily it might have been that you had never been born to this supreme inheritance! How easily it might have been that the dust of the earth, which goes to compact your visible bodies, the brave, strong limbs, the mobile lips, the keen, bright eyes, the brain, that inscrutable instrument, the gates of the heart with their ceaseless motion—how easily it might have been that that dust now so marvellously organised had gone to build up some fragment of the earth's rocky crust instead of this dwelling-house of a human soul! How easily it might have been that the mysterious spark of conscious existence which constitutes yourself had never been kindled, and that you had not been! And the vast world of mankind would have gone on almost the same without you. None would have thought, or felt, or known that you were not there. None would have perceived an empty place in the ranks of our race. But it would have seemed full and whole as it does to-day.

But the frame has been built up by the hand of God, and the spark of life that all the ages cannot extinguish has been kindled in you; and here you are in the world, instinct with consciousness, quick with life, an individuality distinct and separate for ever from all the other millions of millions of creatures in the universe, yet bound to a multitude of your fellows by innumerable bonds of dependence, of communion, of service, of love. Is there any miracle in all the miracles the wildest imagination has ever fancied, equal to this solemn, inexplicable, supreme miracle that you exist and live endowed with the glorious faculties of a human soul?

Endowed with the solemn trust of life: and what are you making, what do you mean to make, of that trust? We have sung to-day that this year is given to us

For hope and peace and love,
For faith and truth and Heaven.

How do you mean to reap that priceless harvest? You have asked God to Bless our yet untrodden way,

Lead us through the entered year.

How do you mean to win that blessing or secure that divine guidance? You have called on the Spirit gracious, truthful, tender, silent, mighty, holy, to dwell with you. How will you win to yourself in this half-century of weeks which make up the year, the grace and the truth, the tenderness and the quietude, the might that comes of life with God, the holiness of the perfect consecration? Are you praying God, by night, by day, to help you to lift the life which He has given you up to this high level, and to be the thing which He created you to be?

I suppose in this last week or two there is hardly one of the younger worshippers in our church who has not enjoyed some Christmas merriment. The change from year to year is in most homes where there are young hearts a season of much festivity. You have joined in the frolic of Christmas games, or whirled in the swift dance round the decorated rooms, or gathered before the blazing hearth to tell strange tales of mystery or terror. And the pleasant laughter and the bright eyes and the glad faces are surely good in the sight of the Lord, and with all innocent mirth there goes the kindly blessing of the Most High. He made your feet to glow in varied motion, your blood to flow gladly through your veins, your hearts to be light and buoyant in mutual intercourse, your faces to kindle with mutual smiles. And while the thoughts are all innocent and the actions all sober, there is no fear but the benediction of heaven may go along with the very gayest of Christmas festivities. But the few days' play, none the less, should only be the prelude to the earnest work which is to make the main history of the year. Life is not sport, but life is real and earnest. That old preacher would well have won his fame as the wisest preacher that ever made a sermon if all his words had been as wise and weighty as these few: "Rejoice, O young man in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth; and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." Yes, into judgment—not, indeed, into any unjust, cruel judgment, but into the wise, grave judgment of the loving Father, who gladly gives his son many pleasures and much delight, yet requires that not for these things should he live, but only draw from them cheerfulness and brightness and manly strength for the great task of true and worthy living.

And so these years of life on this busy earth lie before you—precious years full of opportunity—yet even for the young but few. And you have to shape your plan and mode of life. You have to draw the main lines of purpose and of conduct on which it shall be built up. Some, perhaps, will in this year that is just begun make that great life-choice involved in the complicated conditions of our modern civilisation, the choice of a profession or a business in life. Time was when that was determined for a man without choice by him or by his parents. According to the caste and rank in which he was born was his destiny through all the years. It was ordained from the beginning that he must be courtier, or soldier, or priest, or artisan, or slave. But now before all sorts and conditions of men lie open all the estates, and the moment for decision comes and cannot be put off. If there is great pressure to some one course or another, it is not by the decree of immutable custom, but by the fierce competition of our times which compels so many youths to take to this or that life-long occupation independently of personal taste, only too thankful that any means of livelihood unfold before them.

But so far as there is a choice, what a solemn choice it is! Something to which to give up all the best hours of the day through all the best years of your life. Something to which to devote for twenty, thirty, forty years the chief part of whatever powers God has given you. Some service to be entered into for our common humanity to which your energies shall be given up even till you are an old man. There is a word which we use lightly about this, forgetting the significance it carries in it, yet a word which justly marks the gravity of the young man's life-choice. We speak of a man's occupation as his "calling." His calling! Yes, and no man should ever enter on any business or profession, to which he cannot feel that he is "called"—called as to a true and genuine service of the community, called by the voice of conscience which approves only of service which is real and honest, small and humble though it be. It is not only to the ministry of the Churches that a young man may be truly called of God. That calling has its deep, sure joys when life is truly consecrated to it, though it have its silent life-long care—often its keen pain of disappointment also. But how truly in many another life-task may a young man hear daily the call of God to loyal service. I have known at least one solicitor who in his daily work did as much and solid good as any minister, with wise and honourable counsel lifting men out of difficulty, extricating them from entanglement, persuading them to rigid honesty when the sharp trick was so tempting, dissuading them from contentious litigation, winning the confidence of men and women in many a bewilderment quite outside the scope of ordinary business, infusing into great merchants by the quiet influence of his own bearing the sense of the worthlessness of riches at the cost of honour, setting the young man with all the battle of life before him in the way of an honourable career. His was not a "profession" only—something professed before his fellows—it was a "calling," a calling by God to walk by paths of high responsibilities honourably discharged, and the practice of the law ennobled to be not the contention for plunder, but the bringing of the eternal principles of equity into the daily dealings of men. And from the time I got to know that friend of mine I always hoped that one of my sons might be a solicitor. And the physician also, in how high a sense may he make his profession a calling too. And so all men everywhere who by brain or hand produce that which the world needs, and are determined never to make money by that which is a service to no man, and never to make their own gain at the cost of another man's loss, never to stoop to a trick of the trade which is not honest, never to sell an article pretending that it is that which it is not, never to authorise an advertisement which is not simply and sincerely true, always to use their calling, not for their own advantage only, but for the benefit of their fellows too. The man who holds rigidly by that may grow rich or he may not. But at the very outset each young man or woman taking up a career for life must resolve what the choice shall be—and whether, if ever it come to that, it shall be poverty and ruin before dishonour and dishonesty, or sheer and absolute integrity even at the price of utter commercial disaster.

But it is not everyone that is called upon to make the great choice of a life occupation which shall also be the means of earning daily bread. Some men and many women are so placed that no such necessity is laid upon them. And then it is said of them in a tone of gratulation or of envy, as the case may be, that they have no "need to do anything." No need to do anything! Is that so? What, then, has God given them leave to abstain from any life service? Has he set them free from the common responsibilities of mankind? Ah, you—if any there be here—who congratulate yourselves that there is no necessity for you to do anything—do you not believe that our life is a swift and solemn trust? Do you not believe that there is work for you to do, set you by the great God as surely as the task of any servant in the world is set him by his lord? Your happiness and privilege lies not in this, that there is "no need for you to do anything," but in this, that it is more freely open to you than to most to apply your faculties to the service most congenial to them, seeking your reward only in a good conscience and the benefit you may confer on those among whom you live.

And yet—so strangely does the shallow, selfish, worldly code find lodgment side by side with Christian judgment—there are good and kindly people, people who sincerely honour Christ and devoutly worship God, who yet deem that there is something more genteel, in some mystic way more honourable—especially in a woman—in "doing nothing," as the strange phrase is, than in earning daily bread by daily ministration to some human need. Thank God! these false judgments are passing away swiftly from the heart of our English people; and every New Year's Day sees a sincerer respect accorded to honourable industry and a more widespread condemnation meted out to willing idleness.

But, after all, I have been led to dwell much on the outward things and little on the inward. Yet in truth the call to the youths and maidens of our time to consecrate themselves to God, is a call less to any outward form of life than to a change of the inward heart. One who knew what he said, told men long ago that the Kingdom of God is within; and he told men to seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things should be added to them. They who are consecrated to God in inward spirit will never choose occupations which are not honourable, or sink below the level of high integrity, or prefer idleness to diligence in business, serving the Lord. And the supreme truth for all those to learn before whom lies the trust of life, is that it is this consecration of all the powers of God which alone can give abiding happiness or lead on to the peace that passes understanding. Let them learn this by the fidelity of their daily lives, and they, too, shall know God as they cannot know Him yet. God shall fill them of His own fulness and visit them with His spirit, and He shall be "their trusted Lord," and they shall be "His conscious servants."

IN TIME OF WAR.

"In Time of War: A Plea for Christianity and Civilisation," is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. The responsibility of war, he says, in a free country must rest ultimately with the people. The present war in South Africa, whether right or wrong in the beginning, is now inevitable; but it is not inevitable that we, as a people, should be given over to the evil passions which are so closely akin to war.

If our Christianity be not an organised hypocrisy, our civilisation a thin veneer, we are bound to restrain within ourselves those savage instincts which war tends to quicken in us, and to repudiate all complicity with them: the instincts, I mean, of Revenge, and Hatred, and Greed, which even now are in many ways declaring themselves, unchecked and unabashed in our midst.

Mr. Hargrove thankfully acknowledges that the leading members of the Cabinet have declared that revenge has had no part as motive in causing this war; yet, unhappily, in the excitement of battle and in the baser excitement of the populace at home, that evil passion has been by no means absent.

As to hatred, Mr. Hargrove says:—

It is difficult to fight men, to do our best to injure them in person and property, yet not to hate them. And there have been too many signs of hatred and contempt of our enemies hitherto. There has been a readiness to welcome eagerly every report to their discredit, with the utmost indifference to the source, known or unknown, whence it came. The most shocking charges have been made on the mere voucher, "It is said," "Persons state," "I was told," and the like; and they are taken up and repeated as facts. It is natural enough; we are always prone to believe the worst of our enemies, but it is absolutely anti-Christian, anti-social; it is, strictly speaking, inhuman, unjust; for we are held together by the bonds of mutual respect and forbearance, and there can be no respect where there is willingness to think all evil, and no forbearance where every wrong is exaggerated to the uttermost. They are our enemies now, these Boers, and we must fight them as such; there is no need that we should hate them, nor does war suspend the laws of humanity or of Christ. It is never right to hate your enemies.

And lastly, while the war is declared by our statesmen not to be a war of aggrandisement, Mr. Hargrove quotes some striking evidence that there is in fact an unscrupulous, grasping temper prevalent among our people, and in most unexpected quarters. We trust that the sermon as a whole will be widely read (it may be had of Mr. Chas. Stainer, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds, or at Essex Hall, 1½d. by post), but the concluding passage we must quote here in full:—

"The spirit of militarism, the lust of conquest, the ambition of aggrandisement, have taken possession of our people, and interest in all other questions has died away. The fact we must needs accept, but not without protest; protest on behalf of Christ as against 'the fever of desire,' and 'the thirst for success'; protest for the gentle virtues which civilisation brings in its train, respect for the rights of others, hatred of violent methods, development of our resources by honest industry; protest above all for the Law of God supreme over all nations as over all individuals, 'Thou shalt not steal,' 'Thou shalt not covet,' 'Thou shalt not bear false witness.' Law which checks the fever of desire, and on national ambition, as on the sea waves, imposes the command 'Thus far shalt thou go and no further.' Heedless of this law, men and nations tread the way which, broad though it be and crowded, yet leads to ruin. For as the noble maiden, doomed to die, says in the great Greek tragedy—

None are the counsels strong enough
Of all that come from man, to set at nought
The unwritten laws of God that know not change;
They are not of to-day nor yesterday,
But live for ever, nor can man assign
When first they came to being.

So wrote Sophocles nigh five hundred years before Christ was born. For it is the common spirit of all religions, to revere a Law above our own interests and desires. And when nations grow presumptuous with success, and dare to exalt themselves above the law of right, then is it true, in the words of the Hebrew poet—

He that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh them to scorn,
The Eternal One shall have them in derision.

Mighty is Britain, the sun never loses sight of her flag, nor is any sea unploughed by her keels: but this whole earth—were it ours, sea and land—is but a little place in the Dominion of the Most High, and His Law is alone supreme through all time and space.

"Let us beware, lest, in our almost boundless prosperity, 'lest we forget.' Forget that we are a Christian nation; forget the Fatherhood of God, forget the brotherhood of man, which Christ taught us: lest we be driven by pride and passion to a ruin such as of old overtook Babylon and Rome; such as in our own days we have witnessed consummated on the once proud empire of Spain.

"England's missionaries in every barbarous land 'preach the gospel of peace.' God grant that England's statesmen and England's soldiers set before themselves no lower aim than to make the spirit of that Gospel prevail! But statesmen and soldiers are the servants of the people, they can do neither good nor evil but with our consent; they are of ourselves and share our passions. Let us give no place to the devils of Revenge and Hate and Greed at home, and then they will find no place in the hearts of the brave men who are fighting our battles abroad."

"BACK TO JESUS."

SIR,—Mr. Gow has treated Mr. Drummond's article and my own so entirely in the spirit which we would desire an objector to adopt towards the statement of an unfamiliar position and one therefore to some extent necessarily obscure, that it would be churlish not to attempt some response to his appeal that we should speak out more clearly. I do so the more readily because I think I detect in his letter some small indication that he is not himself wholly satisfied with the view we have ventured to criticise. He appears to be in two minds as to what to think concerning the historic significance of the work of Christ, for in one place it is "a tiny thread spun nearly two thousand years ago," and in another it is "the greatest movement for the uplifting of mankind that history has known." No one, surely, who demands clearness of thought can hold these two estimates together very long, and I entreat Mr. Gow to sacrifice the "tiny thread," which, after all, is only a metaphor, and follow the better reason which guided him when he wrote the second of these descriptions.

We are bidden to say clearly what we mean and endeavour to make ourselves understood. Well, I cannot disguise from myself the conviction that the reason why we are imperfectly understood is not that we disagree with Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Gow only concerning the respective claims of history and intuition, but that we disagree concerning questions yet more fundamental. Mr. Gow, for instance, appears to think it "a terrible thing" that the revelation of God in Jesus should be to anyone "the one perfectly convincing proof of God's Goodness and Love." I, on the contrary, see nothing terrible in it at all, but see something eminently rational and true. Whence this difference between us? I feel assured it arises from the fact that when we speak of the Goodness and Love of God we do not mean the same thing.

There is a belief in the Goodness of God which is derived, can indeed only be derived, apart from Christ, but it is a belief which is of no value for religion. This is the belief in the Good Nature, Benevolence, Kindliness, of God, a belief which stands wholly unrelated to what for religion is the prime fact concerning man, the fact of Sin, and for that reason has no power to constrain the conscience or bend the will. The sole belief in the Goodness and Love of God which takes account of this prime fact, and has therefore a value for religion, is a belief which is reached through the experience of the forgiveness of sin. The Goodness of God is not to me a religious fact at all until the truth of two other facts has been borne in upon me—namely, that God hates sin with undying hatred and yet loves the sinner with undying love. Not until by the conviction of sin I have felt how utterly impossible it must be for the All-Holy to forgive my sin, and yet in spite of this have received the assurance that it is forgiven, can I attach to the idea of the love of God any religious significance or discover that it has any practical bearing upon my life. Only when the experience of contrition makes the love of God the greatest of all marvels do I apprehend it as a reality. It is only when I see it as "Love so amazing, so Divine," that I feel it "demands my soul, my life, my all."

Now this experience which leads us to see in the love of God something which exists, not as a matter of course, but as the miracle of miracles, not as something natural, but as something supernatural, comes through Christ and, I believe, through Christ alone. I know not who else or what else can produce it. Mr. Gow is, therefore, perfectly right when he represents me as holding that "the revelation of God in Jesus is "the one perfectly convincing proof of God's Goodness," but I am much mistaken if when he speaks of God's Goodness he is thinking of what I am thinking.

But Mr. Gow imagines that the fact that Christ appeared two thousand years ago in some way invalidates this experience. He seems to suppose that I have to go back in thought two thousand years before I can reach my faith in God. This is not so. The revelation of God in Christ overtakes me as a fact of present living experience. Under its impression, conveyed through the New Testament and the Christian community, I know nothing of the intervals of history; I know nothing of these two thousand years till I begin to seek a rational justification for my present experience. I want to feel assured that this "impression" is no mere subjective creation of mine, no unbalanced mysticism;* and it is then, but not until then, that I go back the two thousand years and discover by historical analysis that the Christ of history answers to the Christ of experience.

Mr. Gow has said that we appear not to think it "worth while" to find out what Jesus thought and did, and no sentence in his letter shows more clearly how little we are understood. But I may reply that unless the revelation of God in Christ is a vivid fact in present experience I certainly do not think it "worth while" to inquire what he thought and did, except of course as a matter of antiquarian and historical interest. If "the power of the soul" is what Mr. Gow apparently conceives it to be, and every man can be his own redeemer, then obviously there is no pressing necessity to discover what was the religion of Jesus and what was the nature of the impression he made upon his disciples. These questions become academic ones merely, inasmuch as they have no vital relation to the fact of redemption.

I have written at some length but, I fear, to little purpose, and I shall not be surprised if I am told that I have plunged into a deeper darkness than ever. I take consolation, however, from the fact, to which Mr. Gow candidly bears witness, that the view I have explained is one which has to be reckoned with by every student to-day, and from the reflection that, however confused and inarticulate I may be in my efforts to express it, I cannot hinder the power which it is bound to exercise in the coming years, and this, even in circles where the vaunt of openness to new aspects of truth, from whatever quarter they arise, is sometimes accompanied by a singular indisposition to recognise them when they appear.

AMBROSE BENNETT.

* The point of the Ritschlian attack on mysticism is not, as Mr. Gow seems to think, that it is confused and unintelligible, but that it springs from an undue subjectivity, which claims for the individual soul immediate communications from God apart from historical revelation.

TEMPERANCE LITERATURE AT ESSEX HALL BOOK ROOMS.

SIR,—I think the inquiry of Miss Fermor in your issue of the 23rd inst. must have been written under a misapprehension. So far as I am aware the Book Rooms at Essex Hall have never refused facilities for the display of Temperance literature, but on the contrary the publications of the Essex Hall Temperance Association have been readily welcomed, and the recent powerful appeal of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong is stocked at both Book Rooms, also the pamphlet of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, whom Temperance workers will be glad to welcome back to this country.

I was asked a few days ago to apply to the Book Rooms for a special table to be set apart for general Temperance literature, but knowing the extremely limited space at the disposal of Mr. Green and Mr. Hare I did not see my way to make the application, but any Temperance work not in stock will be promptly obtained.

JOHN BREDALL,
Hon. Sec. Essex Hall Temperance Association.

FREE CHURCHES.

SIR,—It is lamentable to see what ignorance still prevails concerning "our Free Churches." Yesterday I received by post a copy of an "Address to the Members of the Theistic Church at the Annual General Meeting, Dec. 18, 1899, by Martin Ridley Smith, Esq," in which the following statements occurs:—

"We are the one Church in the world who set truth and morality above supposed revelation and its corollary superstition; the one Church, which is not bound and fettered by tradition, ceremonial law, sacraments, or the authority (in many cases the cruel tyranny) of a priesthood." "We are the one free, really free, Church in all this world, as England is "the one free country!"

Comment is unnecessary; but one cannot help feeling a little indignant at this quiet ignoring of the really Free Churches which existed long before Mr. Voysey's anti-Christian Theism was ever heard of.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

THE prevailing topic of interest in our London congregations just now is naturally "The Bazaar." By the 1st of May we shall come to the testing point of all the elaborate plans and numerous suggestions which have been exercising our minds this long while already. If the enterprise does not prove an enormous success it will not be the fault either of the secretaries and committees whose deliberations have been zealously forwarded by a host of workers in all directions, or of the good friends in the country who have given us freely both of their counsel, born of happy experience, and of their substantial aid. The hon. treasurer, Mr. Frank Preston, is now keenly on the look-out for communications from those who have held over their donations from a feeling that there was, as yet, "no urgency." The urgency is now becoming evident, and every week increases it. Amongst the sources of revenue from which valuable results are expected, must be counted the entertainments, and the Committee in charge of this department is in high feather over the prospects of repeating with Shakespeare's aid the success to which Milton helped them last summer. On Tuesday, Jan. 16, there is to be a matinée performance of A Midsummer Night's Dream, at the Prince of Wales's Theatre. I need not give further particulars here, but it is gratifying to hear that the demand for tickets has been eager. No doubt the forethought of the manager, in fixing a date when a good many young people will still be at home from school, has had a good deal to do with this result; and if the entertainment serves not only to enrich the treasury, but also to increase the young people's interest in the whole movement, we may congratulate ourselves indeed.

There is just one matter for—I will not say regret, but for earnest attention, as regards the money question. Everyone knows that the effort now on foot was contemplated as a source of permanent help for the work of the society which exists to increase the number and efficiency of our churches in the capital. It was quite rightly considered that the regular income of the London District Unitarian Society was less than adequate even to assist the weaker churches already existing, and that its new work would always be hampered by the judicious fear of running into debt. The Building Fund which is being now raised will supply means for special extension work, and while there will still be need for generous co-operation on the part of our people at large, the Society will probably be relieved of extreme pressure for some time to come—provided that it gets a fair start now. The fact is, however, that owing largely to its work in helping to found the new and thriving congregations at Lewisham and Woolwich, it owes its treasurer some three or four hundred pounds. I believe there was an impression abroad, when the Bazaar scheme was floated, that the Society would be set right in this respect as a part of the good work aimed at; but whether by oversight or otherwise, it is not so, and unless we make some special provision, the whole thing will not come off just as handsomely as it ought to do. It would surely be an absurdity to do the big part and leave the little undone, especially when there is, if I may say so, peculiar reason why the "little part" should be done at this time. It was some time ago intimated, to the sincere regret of all connected with the Committee's work, that Mr. David Martineau, who for more than a quarter of a century has most zealously and invaluably served in the double office of treasurer and chairman, desired to retire from office. He was pressed a year ago to retain it till the Bazaar should be over, when it was expected he would have the satisfaction of handing over his books with a balance to the good. It is incumbent upon us to see that this is done. Some of our friends, I believe, have already diverted their donations intended for the Bazaar Fund towards liquidating the Society's debt. It would be a pity if any of us should be shut up to one only of these good objects; and if this meets the eye of anyone who has yet to give to the Bazaar Fund it will, I hope, suggest a suitable partition of his gifts.

The chronicle of recent events calls for little remark here. In most of the churches there appears to be a steady going on, without much that makes history in the usual sense of the word. The work in London has its peculiar difficulties, and it is something to keep going on without losing ground or losing confidence. How it may be in the North and Midlands I cannot tell, but London is unmistakably saddened and depressed by the war. People of a sort may be found in plenty at a few places of amusement; but the better class of theatres have certainly suffered severely already, and I know serious-minded people who are, as they say, little disposed to attend public worship at this time. I don't quite see why, though it was certainly a subject of serious discussion amongst some of our ministers lately, what they could do with their Christmas services. Surely, we must hold on straight just now. If the times are bad, that is no reason why we should cease to love goodness or to preach righteousness.

The news that the Rev. J. T. Sunderland is coming for a six months' engagement to Highgate is very welcome, and we who met him in London on his return from India will be heartily glad if he comes to stay. Whatever we say about the need of money, what we want most is men. Of persistent church life we have unfortunately but little, at least in these great communities where the tides of population come and go very swiftly and perplexingly. Of merely official ritual we have none; no troops of worshippers come to our churches for priestly aid such as any one priest can give as well as another. It is the living voice and the living mind that they look for in our ministers; and though every true servant of God will do his utmost to bring his hearers to the attitude and spirit of true worship, where all that is local and temporary is absorbed into the eternal and infinite, he is reminded in many ways, some not comfortable ways, that to him has been committed the singular charge, an awe-inspiring responsibility. May the New Year bring us the true riches, of heart, soul and mind; may hearers and ministers be both enriched and strengthened for the great work committed to us all!

As I write I hear that the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, whose series of services at Little Portland-street is one of the outstanding events of recent months, is slowly recovering strength after a somewhat severe attack of influenza. We in London have now the pleasure of feeling that his congregation is wider than ever it was, thanks to the special services' scheme, by means of which he has become known to thousands in different parts of England and Scotland. (I suppose Ireland and Wales will claim their share also!) The scheme has, indeed, been so successful in this way, that one wishes we had half-a-dozen travelling preachers of the kind, to inspire ministers and congregations with fresh ardour, and to lift them a little out of that sense of isolation and sparseness of numbers which chills all but the most enthusiastic. W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The congregation, while it is seeking the support of the Unitarian public in its endeavour to erect a good church, has recently decided to build a temporary iron school, capable of accommodating about 300 persons, for the purposes of public worship, Sunday-school work, and general congregational business. This undertaking will be effected by the congregation itself. On New Year's Day an interesting little ceremony was performed by the committee and members. In the afternoon they met on the acquired site in Richmond-street, which is sufficiently large for all prospective buildings, and staked out the ground for the first undertaking. The first sod of the site was cut and turned by the Rev. W. C. Hall. Then the stakes were driven into the earth by Mr. W. Belfield, Mr. S. Taylor, and other members of the committee and congregation. Brief speeches were delivered, including one by the Rev. J. Marriott Craven (Congregationalist), who said he believed there was room and use for a strong Unitarian Church in the town, and expressed his sympathy with the movement. It is expected that the congregation will enter its new temporary home in February.

Bath.—During the present week the congregation of Trim-street Chapel has had a succession of pleasant evenings. On Tuesday the New Year's treat was given to the Sunday scholars; a congregational gathering took place on Wednesday, and on Thursday the members of the mothers' meeting were entertained. On each occasion an excellent programme was provided by young people connected with the chapel, consisting of illustrated songs, tableaux, and a short play. All were heartily thanked for the great trouble taken to provide for the amusement of young and old in so thorough and successful a manner.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—Mr. W. J. Clarke begs to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of £1 from "R. A." for the two aged sisters mentioned in his article on "Christmas among the Poor," reproduced in THE INQUIRER on Dec. 23 last.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The annual service of Recognition and Self-Dedication was held on Sunday morning last, the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., being the preacher. A welcome was given to forty-nine members who had been enrolled during the past year. Of these twenty-seven belong to families already on the roll, six represent families connected with the congregation, but not hitherto on the roll, nine have come from kindred congregations, and seven from outside Unitarianism. The losses by death, removal, and lapse amounted to twenty-one, so that there was a net gain of twenty-eight enrolled members for the year—a total net gain of eighty-four during the last three years. Fourteen of the new members had attended the minister's preparation class for 1899, two the classes of 1897 and 1898, and three the 1897 class. The membership of the 1899 class numbered twenty-six, with an average attendance of fifteen. A vesper musical service was held in the evening, appropriate to the close of the year. The chapel and school have been fitted with the electric light, the kind gifts of Mr. J. P. Thomasson and Mr. J. W. Scott respectively.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The twenty-second annual Christmas Fair and Sale of Work was held in the schools on Jan. 1 and 2. The large room was astefully decorated. Busy hands had loaded the stalls with the products of the autumn and winter's work, while the recent installation of the electric light—the generous gift of Mr. J. P. Thomasson—added both brightness and healthiness. The minister, the Rev. H. M. Livens, occupied the chair on both occasions. The Fair was opened on the first day by Councillor W. Healey, J.P., of Heywood, who gave a hearty and encouraging address. As it is intended to alter and enlarge the premises so as to meet the growing demands of the school, Mr. Healey earnestly appealed for support to such a useful object, illustrating from his own personal experience the value and the life-long influence of the Sunday school. The opener on the second day was Miss Curtis, a member of the church and friend of the school. In her address she referred with tender and grateful remembrance to her early associations with "that prince of Sunday-schools," Lower Mosley-street, Manchester, of which her father was for many years the superintendent. The proceeds amounted to £305, being the largest sum yet raised at any Unity Christmas Fair.

Boston.—Last Sunday afternoon Mr. Lucking Tavener, of Stepney, gave an interesting lecture on "Sartor Resartus," and in the evening preached on "What is Man?"—a sermon which was much appreciated.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—A gathering of the members of the Committee, and other friends of the mission, took place at the mission on Friday, Dec. 29 last, for the purpose of taking leave of the Rev. J. Wain, who is settling at Trowbridge, as minister of the Conigre Chapel. Opportunity was also taken to present to Mr. Wain a mark of the regard in which he is held by them. Mr. A. H. Wansey, in a few felicitous words, made the presentation, which consisted of a purse containing £51, a set of silver teaspoons, and a handsomely-illuminated address. Mr. P. J. Worsley, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, and Mr. J. Kenrick Champion bore testimony to the whole-hearted service Mr. Wain had given to the difficult work of the mission, and recognised how successful he had been in his labours. While each regretted his departure, all united in wishing him Godspeed and success in his new sphere of labour. The Rev. J. Wain acknowledged the presentation, and thanked the Committee for the many kindnesses that had been extended to him during the ten years he had had charge of the mission, kindnesses which had greatly lightened the somewhat difficult work. He was conscious, of course, of many shortcomings, but he had tried to do his duty to every branch in connection with the mission. The Rev. A. Lancaster, who succeeds Mr. Wain as missionary minister, will commence his duties on the first Sunday in the New Year.

Chester.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will, unfortunately, not be able to preach in Matthew Henry's Chapel to-morrow (Sunday). The bi-centenary of the chapel was not held last year, as stated in the "Retrospect," but only re-opening services, in preparation for the bi-centenary to be celebrated during the present year.

Chorley.—We held our annual Sunday-school party on Christmas Day. A large number were present at tea, and at the meeting afterwards the schoolroom was full. The Rev. Andrew Doel presided. Songs, recitations, &c., were given by the scholars. Prizes were given to the scholars for regular attendance, &c., and were distributed by Mr. James Crabtree, of Todmorden.

Cirencester.—On Jan. 2 the Christmas tree and tea, in connection with the Sunday-school, took place, when scholars, teachers, and friends spent a most enjoyable afternoon and evening. The tree was brilliantly decorated, and many useful presents and toys were distributed among the scholars.

Derby.—The annual Christmas party and prize distribution of the Friar-gate Sunday-school took place on Wednesday week. Tea was followed by an enjoyable programme of recitations, music, and two sketches by scholars and teachers. The Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., presided, and presented the prizes to the scholars.

Edinburgh.—Mr. Robert Wilson (author of "Laurel Leaves") conducted the service at St. Mark's Chapel, on Sunday last, and preached an eloquent sermon from the text: "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold," concluding as follows:—My friends, we are on the verge of the penultimate Christmas of the nineteenth century. What hope is there for the Christendom of the twentieth? In the Christ that the first disciples knew after the flesh? In the Christ of the ecclesiastical folds? A great statesman once wrote to me: "'Ere your aspirations be fulfilled, Christians will have to be converted to Christianity." We must await the advent of the Christ to be. We need no millennial return of Messiah to earth to fulfil the dreams of the fanatic. Nevertheless, let us watch for the star in the East. Let us not ever revert with straining vision to the Christ of the fragmentary gospels, from which it is often so difficult to piece together his sacred image; but let us carry the eye of trust to the infinite light beyond, in the assurance that God will envelope all our doubts, all our baffled aspirations, in the sacred quest of truth, and that He will claim them as His own.

Guildford.—At the last meeting in the Old Year of the Ward-street Literary and Debating Society, there was a goodly attendance of members to hear a lecture by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, one of the founders of the society, on "Old Norwich." Mr. Daplyn received a very cordial welcome from his old friends, and his lecture was greatly enjoyed. He paid an eloquent tribute to the architecture of the city, but dealt hardly with its present municipal life.

Leeds: Hunslet.—On Dec. 30 the school children had their Christmas party, and enjoyed themselves thoroughly. A good part of the happy evening was filled up with recitation and games On New Year's Day Miss Thornton gave a delightful concert, assisted by various members of her family. This is now becoming an annual institution, and great credit is due to Miss Thornton for her exertions in this direction. There was a good audience, which showed its appreciation of this musical treat, which lasted for nearly three hours, the whole of the proceeds going to the church funds.

Lewisham.—The year 1899 closed very happily and pleasantly for the Sunday-school here. At the beginning of the year there were twenty-seven children in attendance, and now there are about fifty. The third annual Christmas party was held on Dec. 28, and, thanks to kind friends and willing workers, was an unqualified success. During the evening the children, under the direction of Mrs. P. Minhinnick, rendered a musical sketch, and, under the bâton of Mr. George Callow, a Cantata.

Liscard.—On the evening of Peace Sunday the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas preached an earnest sermon on the war in South Africa, urging that those who felt it to be unjust ought not to submit to the argument that it was now inevitable, but should use every effort to bring about a cessation of hostilities.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—On Peace Sunday the Rev. R. A. Armstrong preached a sermon on "The War," a full abstract of which, as noted in another column, appears in this week's New Age.

London: Sydenham.—The special services held at the close of the last year in the Public Hall, Kirkdale, Sydenham, will be again renewed on Jan. 14, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will conduct the first of the new series, to be held on six consecutive Sunday evenings. The result of the first series was sufficiently encouraging to justify this further effort, and it is hoped that the friends who rendered such good help in the past will be able to assist us again. The success of the movement will depend very largely upon the practical sympathy and co-operation of our own "household of Faith." Those who can sing, or play, or are willing to help in other ways, may communicate with the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Trevone, Knollys-road, Streatham, S.W.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—The Rev. Walter Reynolds, B.A., revived the Christmas Day service, and preached upon "Jesus, the light of the Gentiles." On the same day the scholar's party took place, prizes were distributed, and addresses were delivered by the minister, and the superintendents, Mr. W. T. Reynolds and Mr. E. Jones, whilst the scholars sang and recited. The seniors' party was held on New Year's Day. The minister took the chair, and gave an address, as did also the superintendents, and Mr. Hetchells, of the Church Committee.

Newton Abbot.—On Monday evening, Dec. 18, a meeting was held in the Public Rooms, in connection with the Unitarian movement, Major-General Jacob, President of the Western Union, in the chair. There were also present the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who had preached at Torquay and Newton Abbot on the previous day, Dr. Greaves, the Revs. F. T. Reed, A. E. O'Connor, T. B. Broadrick, J. Barron, and others. The Chairman, in his opening speech, urged the need for sincerity in religion, and fidelity to the highest truth; and congratulated the Unitarians of Newton Abbot on the success of their efforts to organise a church. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie then gave an address on the movements of religious thought in the present time, and on the character of the Unitarian message, which recognised, he said, that religion had its roots in humanity, and must be based on fearless trust in the righteousness and goodness of God. Their appeal was to those who could no longer accept the creeds of the popular churches. Other speakers followed, and the meeting was of a thoroughly encouraging nature.

Northampton.—The Rev. J. Byles preached in Kettering-road Church on Peace Sunday on the evils of war and the relation of patriotism to the true spirit of humanity.

Nottage.—The annual Christmas entertainment took place on New Year's evening. Owing to the illness of several active workers, the treat was not held on Christmas Day. The children sang and recited very creditably, and a good selection of books and other articles were distributed to the scholars at the close of the entertainment. The minister closed the proceedings by urging all old scholars to be faithful during the new year, and inviting new scholars to join the school.

Oxford: Church of the Divine Love.—The gross receipts of a jumble sale amounted to £6 9s. 5d., which was considered highly satisfactory. The service on Christmas Day was well attended.

Park-lane Chapel, near Wigan.—On Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 26 and 27, a number of the young people gave a dramatic representation of Charles Dickens' Christmas Carol. The various characters were ably represented in a manner which testified to careful preparation and great interest. The piece was enlivened by the rendering at intervals of several Christmas carols and other appropriate music, under the direction of Mrs. Stead. On Sunday, Dec. 31, a watch night service was held, being attended by about forty of the younger members of the congregation, whose interest was testified to by the earnest and attentive manner in which they entered into the service. Retiring from the chapel to the schoolroom the advent of the New Year was further emphasised by a hearty interchange of greetings and the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Stockport.—The annual Christmas party in connection with the Sunday-school was held on Christmas Day. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. J. F. Spedding, father of the Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, and a former scholar, teacher, secretary, and superintendent of the school, who made a few introductory remarks appropriate to the occasion. The programme included glees by the singing class, a drama, entitled The Porter's Knot, an operetta, and a farce. The stage had been permanently enlarged, and new scenery, painted entirely by the young men and women of the school. The performance of the plays and the children's operetta, as well as the singing of the singing class, was very well done, considering that so much time had been devoted to the extensive alterations of the stage. The minister, the Rev. B. C. Constable, said a few words in praise of the young people's work, and proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman. The attendance was unusually large, the schoolroom being crowded, and some having to be turned away, unable to gain admission.

Styal and Dean-row.—The Rev. John Felstead, who terminated his ministry at Styal and Dean-row on the last Sunday in the old year, has just received a cheque for £70 7s. as a token of regard from the two congregations, coupled with the assurance that the gift represents contributions, not from a few merely, but from almost, or, quite all, the members of each congregation. He was very deeply touched by this generosity, as he had not been in the least aware that anything of the kind was contemplated.

Sunderland.—The congregation have lost an esteemed member in Mr. Joshua Fothergill, who died Dec. 23, aged seventy-two. He was a native of Ouseburn, Newcastle-on-Tyne, at which place he served his apprenticeship as a wire-worker. He then went to Manchester, and eventually commenced business in Sunderland on his own account, and by his industry and steadiness secured success. He was a man of kindly heart and sterling character, and was goodness itself. He loved the Unitarian faith and supported it with genuine liberality. A man without ostentation, simple in his religion, sincere in all he said and did, his long life teaches an admirable lesson of duty well done. A memorial service was held on Sunday evening, Dec. 31, conducted by Mr. J. G. Stirling.

Walsall.—A Christmas sale of work in aid of the funds of the Unitarian Free Church was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday and Thursday nights, Dec. 27 and 28. Notwithstanding fog on the first night, and heavy rain on the second, the effort was successful, about £15 being realised. On the Wednesday night an excellent entertainment was given, under the management of Mr. A. Homer.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE are glad to hear that the Sunday-school Association are definitely arranging a second Summer Session for teachers, to be held, as last year, at Oxford and at about the same time. The teachers are again assured of a cordial welcome from the Principal and Professors of Manchester College, and there is every reason to expect that this year's meeting will prove as helpful and as delightful in every way as the last. Mr. J. H. Woods has again most kindly consented to act as local secretary. It may possibly prove not to be advisable to make the meetings annual; but it is rightly felt that a two years' experiment will be a better guide than the experience of a single session, after which the Association may be able to decide at what intervals the meetings would be most profitably held. Notice will soon be given as to when and to whom application must be made, by those who wish to attend this summer's Session.

THE new Memorial Church at Plymouth, Mass., was opened on Dec. 21, with an impressive service of dedication. It takes the place of the Forefathers' Church, destroyed by fire four years ago, which was built in 1831, and which stood in the succession of buildings going back to the time of the Pilgrim Fathers themselves. The new church, of which illustrations are given in the Christian Register of Dec. 28, seems to be a substantial building, modest, but not undignified in appearance. The Governor of Massachussetts, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Professor F. G. Peabody, of Harvard, and the Revs. J. T. Eells (of the First Church in Boston), J. de Normandie, S. A. Eliot, and C. P. Lombard, minister of the church, took part in the service. In the course of an address, in which he dwelt upon the early relations between that church and Harvard College, Professor Peabody said :—

The Mayflower, steering across the sea and finding at last security in this land-locked bay—that is the symbol which many cherish, that land-locked seclusion in which religion shall be secured. But the methods of the Pilgrims demand a different picture. They sent their royal barque of faith out on the ocean of truth, not knowing where that mighty voyage might end, but trusting as to a favouring wind, to the spirit of the truth whose leading they obeyed. Their end was not security, but discovery. Others might cast their nets in land-locked waters. The Pilgrims heard the great command, launched forth into the deep; and that is what justifies us in commemorating them here to-day.

IN a recent appeal on the subject of loyalty in giving, the Rev. M. J. Savage, of New York, spoke of the new school established at Tarrytown, under the headship of the Rev. T. C. Williams, formerly of All Souls' Church. The school, like our own Willaston, is to be opened in the autumn, and with the same object of providing a thoroughly good education, in which the religious teaching shall not be under orthodox control, but on the broad principles which Unitarians maintain. Dr. Savage's appeal is that Unitarians shall not allow it to be a failure, through lack of their support.

There are so many Unitarians who think it is broad and liberal for them not to care how their children are trained. They say, Let the child grow up, and then let him decide for himself. Do you do that in regard to anything else except religion? Do you care whether your child is taught whether two and two make five or not? Does not it matter whether he is taught what you profoundly believe to be true in religion or not? If it does not, then give up your religion. If it is fit for you to keep, it is worth teaching to your children—particularly when the very fundamental principle of Unitarianism is breadth and liberality in searching for truth.

But I know people who are sending their children to schools under denominational influence, where they are doing everything they can, and the parents know it, to make them something else besides Unitarians. And I have had people come to me and beg and plead with me to undo the results of their own carelessness and folly. They had sent their children to school, and found they were being trained into something else than they thought; and then they would beg me to teach them the value of Unitarianism, which they had never taken the trouble to do themselves!

And at the same time I know Episcopal clergymen who say, "You Unitarians are sending your boys to our schools, and we will do everything we can to make Episcopalians of them." And they ought to, if they believe it, just as you ought to make Unitarians of them, if you believe it.

We are going to have, I trust, a grand school, in which the grand humanitarianism of religion, in the light of the broadest thought and study, is going to be taught. If you believe in it, give it some money. If you believe that it is a good thing, do the next best, or perhaps the thing that is better still—send your boys there, and help it succeed. Let us build up a school that we shall be proud of, and that shall be an inspiration all over the land.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S new story, "Eleanor," begins in the January Harper, with so much interest that we find it very difficult to be patient with the monthly issue. It opens in a villa on a ridge of the Alban Hills, looking over the Campagna, and within sight of Rome. There Manisty, an English politician, who has broken with his party and is writing a book, is staying with his aunt and cousin (Eleanor), and to them comes as a visitor from a New England village, Lucy Foster, to whom all our sympathies are inclined to go; but what will happen we must wait to see. We find it difficult to recognise Mrs. Ward's Manisty, even with this first slight acquaintance, in the pictures of him in the illustrations. There is abundant interest in the rest of the number. Other magazines also furnish good supplies for the lovers of contemporary fiction. In Scribner's, Mr. J. M. Barrie's sequel to "Sentimental Tommy" begins, under the title, "Tommy and Grizel," the hero having blossomed into a remarkable literary man in London. Cornhill has the opening chapters of Merriam's new story, "The Isles of Unrest." In the same number is a lecture by the Bishop of London on "Elizabethan London."

LAST week's Ethical World contains a vigorous article on "The Ethics of Journalism," by H. W. Massingham, an article which gains interest from the recent trouble in the Daily Chronicle Office; an article, by Mr. Keir Hardie, on "The Outlook for Labour"; a declaration of faith in "Ethics and Democracy," by Dr. Stanton Coit; and the first half of a short story of peace and war, entitled "Glorious Recollections," by the Baroness von Suttner, the well-known authoress of "Lay Down your Arms!" The price of the Ethical World is now reduced to a penny. The form of the paper remains as before.

Young Days begins this month its twenty-fifth volume, and the seventh of the present series. The Guild work for this year is to be on Famous Buildings of the World, and it begins with the Tower of London. A page of illustrations is given, and members have to write short essays telling what they know about the buildings. The January number opens with a story by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, "Tit for Tat; or, Tommy's Transmigrations," and there are the first chapters of a serial story by Miss Theodora Mills, "Clare Heatherton's Mistake, a Story of Friendship."

THE Christian Freeman, which was founded by the late Robert Spears forty-three years ago, has long been a welcome visitor in many of our homes, and is also used, as is the Seed-sower and the New Kingdom, for incorporation with church calendars. Besides other good matter the Christian Freeman is giving month by month four short Sunday-school lessons, followed by illustrative stories, the contributor this month being the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones.

THE literary columns of the Scotsman are generally so very carefully and accurately prepared that we were not a little surprised to read the following note in a recent issue of that newspaper:—

From Mr. Philip Green, London, comes the issue for 1900 of "The Exeter Hall Year Book," a useful and carefully compiled annual of statistical and other information concerning the various Congregational Churches throughout the country. This issue gives it with its information brought carefully down to date.

Our friends at "Exeter" Hall will hardly relish this confusion of their stronghold with such a hot-bed of heresy as "Essex Hall"; and if any Congregationalist, with faith in Exeter Hall, should procure the book, he would be somewhat astonished at the list of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing or kindred congregations.

THE matinée performance of A Midsummer Night's Dream, so long looked forward to by the supporters of the London Bazaar, takes place at the Prince of Wales's theatre next Tuesday afternoon. Particulars will be found advertised in another column. We are glad to hear that the success of the effort is now assured, but there are still a considerable number of stalls available, and a few other places. Friends intending to go to unreserved places are strongly advised to secure tickets beforehand, as it is by no means certain that those who come expecting to pay at the door will find places.

THE ENGLISH EDUCATION EXHIBITION.

AMONG the various sections to be represented at the forthcoming Paris Exhibition there is to be one devoted to Education, in which every country is invited to take part. Now, when the English Committee was formed to make arrangements, it was felt to be somewhat difficult to decide how Education could be exhibited in concrete form; but a meeting having been called together of persons connected with, or interested in, the many branches of educative work, a warm enthusiasm for the matter was awakened, and a great many scholastic centres agreed to send in specimens.

Then came a very practical suggestion. "Let us," said one gentleman, "have a preliminary exhibition in London, so that our own people may have the chance of seeing the strides that have been made." This happy idea was acted upon, and from it another advantage was secured. It enabled the Committee to have a large selection before them from which to choose, and thus the exhibit for the French Exhibition bids fair to be of the best; for, having the many separate items brought together, it will not be difficult to arrange them in a properly classified manner.

Such is the origin of the exhibition at the Imperial Institute which was opened on Friday week by the Prince of Wales, and which we trust that many friends in London will visit during the next two weeks that it is to remain open. The Duke of Devonshire commenced the proceedings with a short address, in which he laid special stress on "the voluntary and individual effort that we English have so strenuously cherished," in contradistinction to most of the Continental systems, where education is practically all under State control, and where, therefore, the arrangements for any such exhibition would have devolved on one of the great departments of the State.

In replying to the address, the Prince of Wales referred to the immense strides that had been made during the reign of Her Majesty the Queen. "It is difficult," said he, "to picture what shape such an exhibition as this would have taken had it been held sixty-two years ago. Perhaps it is safest to say that it would have been an impossibility. Elementary education, technical education, the education of women and girls, could hardly have been represented at all."

As these last words were spoken, one could scarcely help looking round the assemblage of black coated gentlemen on the platform and wondering how long the next phase of education would take to be accomplished; whether it may be looked for that, at the end of another sixty-two years, such women as Lady Frederick Cavendish, Miss Mary Gurney, and Dr. Sophia Bryant will be expected, as a matter of course, to occupy seats alongside the "lords of creation" who, on Friday last—according to the custom of to-day on such occasions—monopolised all the seats of honour!

The exhibition having been declared open, everyone flocked into the two large rooms where most interesting specimens of work and workmanship were displayed, together, it must be owned, with exhibits which were somewhat far-fetched, viewed from a purely educational standpoint. On the whole, however, we, as a nation, may, I think, be justly proud of the display. The colleges, the high schools, the technical schools, were well represented, and it was good also to see that the evening classes in many of the towns take especial pains with the training in local industries, as evidenced, for example, by a case full of ribbons from Coventry, and an exhibit of boots in all stages of "growth" from Northampton.

Winchester has the honour of showing, so I hear, the only specimen of that once universal but now, happily, almost defunct instrument of "education" (?)—namely, the rod; an old "Bibling rod," as it is called, being on view in one of the cases; above which is the famous Latin motto found in the school, which may be translated, "Either learn or go; a third way remains—the rod."

The Board-schools have been most active in their co-operation in the matter. Specimens of carpentery, design, needlework, various departments of the kindergarten, and even cooking—all these find a place on the stalls, and give evidence of the care taken in the education in hand and eye of the so-called "masses," to say nothing of the numerous proofs of mind culture which is carried on in our elementary schools.

Among all the exhibits, however, there is one in which we are more especially interested; I refer to that of the Sunday School Association. The promoters of the exhibition, recognising the important factor of Sunday-school teaching in English education, invited the Secretary of the Sunday School Association to the preliminary meeting before mentioned, together, of course, with those from the more orthodox bodies. Curiously enough, it would appear from the result that he was the only one representing the Sunday-schools of England to respond to the invitation; at any rate, so far as we could see, our Sunday School Association has the sole honour of representing this branch of National education in the Imperial Institute. And an excellent exhibit it is, too; on the board at the back hang many specimens of reports, certificates, examination papers, &c., together with a photographic group from Oxford, of most of the students of the first Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers; while in front lies a classified selection of books published by the Association, with the honoured face of Dr. James Martineau looking out from the open page of The Helper for 1898. In the centre of the foreground stands a leathern box containing a number of daintily-dressed green pamphlets, in which the Rev. J. J. Wright has told the story of the origin and growth of the Sunday-school. These are for free distribution, and it is intended to provide as many copies as may be necessary for giving away during the time of the exhibition in Paris, should we be allowed, as it is hoped and expected that we shall, to have a space allotted to us there.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES FOR INQUIRERS IN RELIGION.—I.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, in one of his suggestive parables, tells us of a certain man who rode forth into the world to find "the touch-stone of the trial of truth," the stone in whose light "the seeming goes, and the being shows." "Wherever he came to a place of habitation, he would ask the men if they had heard of it. And in every place the men answered, Not only have we heard of it, but we alone of all men possess the thing itself, and it hangs by the side of our chimney to this day. And then the man would be glad and beg for a sight of it." Sometimes it would be a piece of a mirror, that showed the seeming of things; and they said to him, "What more do you want? There is no truth but the plain truth." And then he would say, "This can never be, for there should be more than the seeming." And sometimes it would be a piece of coal, which showed nothing; and then he would say, "This can never be, for at least there is the seeming." And sometimes, "It would be a touchstone indeed, beautiful in hue, the light dwelling in its sides; and when he found this, he would beg the thing, and the persons of that place would give it to him, for all men were very generous of that gift; so that at last he had his wallet full of them." And when he halted by the side of the way he would take them out and try them; but nothing ever came of it. Each one seemed excellent by itself; yet when he put them together, each one seemed to put out the shining of the others and make all their colours dull. But the desire of finding the one test of truth was so strong within him that for years he persevered in his search. At last he received a clear pebble that had no beauty and no colour. He looked upon it scornfully, and shook his head: "It will only be like the rest," he said; but he took it and rode away. Presently, alighting from his horse, he emptied forth his wallet by the wayside, and tried the new touchstone on the others. "Now in the light of each other, all the touchstones lost their hue and fire, and withered like stars at morning; but in the light of the pebble their beauty remained, only the pebble was the most bright. And the traveller smote upon his brow: How if it be the truth, he cried, that all are a little true? And he took the pebble, and turned its light upon the heavens, and they deepened about him like the pit; and he turned it on the hills, and the hills were cold and rugged, but life ran in their sides so that his own life bounded; and he turned it on the dust, and he beheld the dust with joy and terror; and he turned it on himself, and he knelt down and prayed."

I have quoted this because it expresses in pictorial form one of the most important truths to be remembered by all who wish to guide and help the thoughts of their fellow-men to-day. What is the real meaning of the conflict between the "old" and the "new" thought? There is no end to the doubts and difficulties concerning religion which this conflict occasions in the minds of those who allow themselves to think: but the confusion has a meaning. Not, that faith is dying out; but that faith is changing its form, and the old forms are being forsaken. We are tired of seeking the living among the dead, a living faith among the ruins of old creeds; the Lord of Truth beckons us to follow him into a grander world of larger and more satisfying knowledge. Yet, not that the seeker after truth may turn away from all that men have thought about God and duty and eternal life, and treat it as a mere accumulation of "error"; he has to take possession of these "errors," and find the good that was in them—the truth that made them survive. Olive Schreiner, in her beautiful book called "Dreams," represents the truth-seeker as one climbing a mountain with slow, toilsome steps: but this is a false analogy. He has not to scale any height, that takes him away from earth; he has to take possession of this earth and enter into it. Stevenson's picture is far more true and real. The true touchstone is not a rival to the others; it is that which makes the others reveal what light is in them. Is it a small thing to realise that every faith which is widely and devoutly believed, from generation to generation, must have some degree of truth in it? It cannot possess all the truth—it may not possess even an important truth—yet it has a fragment, worth searching for and preserving. This is, of course, the reason why it is believed—why men cling to it and even fight for it against what seems to be destroying it. And what we want is for old faiths to be recast into new forms, with their deeper meaning shining through more clearly; the form changing, the old spirit remaining to grow more pure and high.*

Related to the result which we have reached is a two-fold principle which may be suggested by a passage from Browning, giving perhaps its most forcible expression; the Pope's famous soliloquy on the incapacity of Language:—

Expect nor question nor reply
At what we figure as God's judgment-bar!
None of this vile way by the barren words
Which, more than any deed, characterise
Man as made subject to a curse.
Why, can he tell you what a rose is like,
Or how the birds fly, and not slip to false
Though truth serve better? Man must tell his mate
Of you, me and himself, knowing he lies,
Knowing his fellow knows the same—will think
"He lies, it is the method of a man!"
Therefore these filthy rags of speech, this coil
Of statement, comment, query, and response,
Tatters all too contaminate for use,
Have no renewing: He, the Truth, is, too,
The Word. We men, in our degree, may know
There, simply, instantaneously, as here
After long time and amid many lies.

Here we touch on one of Browning's favourite thoughts, expressed by him in many ways. In Sordello, it is said that "Perceptions whole reject so pure a work of thought as language"; and Sordello, when he tries to express his infinite dreams and desires in words, finds language only a "makeshift," the "bravest of expedients." When the Pope would put into words his own deepest convictions, he finds that "speech babbles thus"; and Rabbi Ben Ezra tells us of "fancies which break through language and escape, and yet help to make up what we are worth to God." We describe our feelings and ideas in words which cannot convey them; and we are obliged to accept the expressions and act upon them as if they were perfect, while we know that they are not. Hence the Pope's paradox: "He lies, it is the method of a man."

All who have come in contact with written or oral discussions on religious, theological, or philosophical matters, will have noticed one thing above all else: how sometimes confusion reigns supreme solely through verbal misunderstandings. When a number of persons are "exchanging ideas," as we say, on these difficult subjects, the most which may be hoped for—not that it is a small thing—is that the ideas shall be really "exchanged": that each person shall learn to understand the others' point of view, receiving their real thoughts into his own mind, and that he shall get his own thoughts expressed in such a way that the others can receive them in return. The more unaccustomed we are to thinking and speaking about the subjects in question, the harder it is for us to arrive at this mutual understanding. The topics lie outside our common, everyday ways of thinking. The difficulty in discussing them has the twofold source that Browning speaks of: language can never mean quite the same for different minds; and in certain cases it is impossible to get our real meaning properly expressed in language. Let us examine the first of these more carefully.

From the practical point of view, what is the real aim or object of thinking? Information may be regarded as the primary practical aim of our thought, in every assertion and denial which we make. In other words, all thought points outwards from mind to mind by means of language; every assertion or denial is, actually or in imagination, addressed to some other person. Hence we see a necessary quality of those thoughts which our assertions or denials contain; they must have a meaning for other minds beyond the one which uses them; and they must have exactly the same meaning for all these different minds, for in so far as they have not, the information conveyed is confused or misunderstood. Now thought, in this proper sense of the word, is a thing quite other than imagination. It is quite possible for people to fancy that they are exchanging thoughts when in reality they are only comparing their mental pictures. These "mental images"—as the psychologists call them—are really memories of things perceived by our senses, memories combined in new ways. The images formed by different minds may, of course, roughly resemble one another, and hence may be compared by means of language, when the words stand for mental pictures rather than for thoughts. This has been called "picture-thinking." But in real thinking the mind grasps not merely some kind of image or picture of a thing; it grasps the relations between the parts which make up that picture—its intellectual plan or scheme. So far as we are able to do this, we begin to understand the thing; and it is possible for such thoughts to agree perfectly, to be identically the same, though in different minds.

Picture-thinking and real thinking are always mingled together in our minds; hence it is so hard for words to mean the same for us all, so long as we are only human beings. While their meanings form part of ordinary experience, they get rubbed round, so to speak, into being practically the same for all minds; but where the facts which the words refer to are unfamiliar, the great difficulty is to get them to suggest the same thoughts to different people. There is no remedy but careful and conscientious thought—that for every word used in these great subjects, there may be at least a fragment of a real thought, and not a vague imagination. S. H. MELLONE.

LITERATURE.

TEXTS EXPLAINED.*

THIS short and pithy title introduces the reader to a very substantial volume, the latest of the numerous literary offspring of the learned and venerable author. The book is in substance a miscellaneous collection of verses and parts of verses from the New Testament, each of the cited texts being briefly "explained" and sometimes commented upon more at length, according to the author's idea of its need of elucidation, as it stands in the Authorised or the Revised Version. The latter is evidently highly valued by Dean Farrar; while yet he is not sparing of his criticisms upon it, where it appears to him to be in fault, as doubtless it is sometimes.

In many cases Dr. Farrar's review of his selected texts certainly brings out a fuller as well as a more correct meaning of the original. In other cases the change suggested is but trifling, and hardly worth making; while in others, again, there is, we think, a little too much of arbitrary and over-interpretation, with the effect of ascribing to the text a meaning which the original writer cannot have intended. An illustrative instance occurs in the following:—

Philip. ii. 6. In this memorable passage about the humiliation and exaltation of Christ, the meaning is, in one phrase, absolutely reversed by the A. V. It is not "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God"; but "Who being originally" (or "essentially") in the form of God counted it not a prize—("not a thing to be grasped at," "a thing to be seized on," "a prize which must not be let go")—"to be on an equality with God."

"In the following clause the "made himself of no reputation" of the A. V. loses the transcendent force of the "emptied himself" of the original, though on the verb in the original is based the important theological doctrine of Christ's Kenosis, i.e., of His emptying Himself of His Divine prerogatives to assume perfect humanity.

This quotation should be compared with the exposition given later in the book (pp. 244-5). It will be seen that the author has no difficulty in deciding what it was of which Christ emptied himself. He is able to tell us that it was "the attributes of Omniscience and Omnipotence"! Where has he learnt this? It is not in the New Testament.

But now, in the verse before us, the meaning "originally" (or "essentially") we venture to say, is not really in the Greek. On the contrary, the original word is common in classical as well as New Testament Greek, not only in the simple sense of being, i.e., existing, but in a further sense which is too much overlooked in this connection. We refer to a well-established signification, and one which very probably affords the true key to the interpretation of the expression. That signification is to begin to be, or to do. Thus, in the conception of Paul, Jesus—entering upon his Messianic office, and, according to the ideas of the time respecting its character, beginning to be the representative of God—did not grasp at this exaltation, but by renouncing it gave to his followers the example of humility to which the Apostle appeals.

But what then, more exactly, was that of which Christ "emptied himself"? Let the reader observe:—In the belief of the writer of the Epistle Jesus was the Christ, the Messiah. This august office and character were his Right, by the Divine appointment, as appears from the whole tone and tenor of the New Testament. That Right was not "original" or "essential" in his nature. But, for reasons which need not be dwelt upon, he laid aside for the time the outward greatness appertaining to it; did not assume the dominion and dignity which might have been his. He humbled himself and set an example of obedience even unto death. He who by virtue of his Messiahship was (beginning to be) in the form of a god on earth, emptied himself of this prerogative; did not grasp at the being equal to a god. Therefore God* also (ὁ θεός) has highly exalted him and given him a name above every name. Such is the interpretation which arises directly from a due regard to the historical circumstances of the case and of the life of Christ. But historical interpretation is what our popular theologians are too apt to avoid; preferring, it would seem, consciously or unconsciously, the easier course of following the dogmatic interpretations of their own duty.

What the Dean describes as "the important theological doctrine of the Kenosis" is a subject on which absolutely nothing is laid down in the New Testament. It is nowhere mentioned, unless it be in this obscure passage, which, however, as we see, admits of a far simpler construction. It can only, therefore, be regarded as a valueless by-product of speculative theology, not a real Christian doctrine. That Jesus should, in the belief of his disciples, have temporarily laid down the Messianic greatness which belonged to his office, is conceivable; but, if he were by his nature "originally" or "essentially" the Infinite Being, or one of three such Beings, how he could lay aside his "attributes of omniscience and omnipotence" is not rationally conceivable.

The following is a more favourable example of Dr. Farrar's work, though it is by no means beyond criticism:—

Ephes. iv. 32. Here the A. V. has "forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." It is from this verse that the very common phrase "for Christ's sake" is exclusively derived. That phrase, though capable of a true explanation, "does not once occur in Scripture in this connotation. The true rendering is far fuller, and far deeper, in meaning: "Even as God also, in Christ, forgave us." The phrase "in Christ" has been called "the monogram of St. Paul."

Yes! and, whatever it be called, the meaning of the preposition is simply instrumental, "even as God by Christ hath forgiven you." This force of the preposition is common in the New Testament. Christ therefore, this text tells us, was the medium, the agent, by whom God hath forgiven us, or made known His purpose of forgiveness. The mystical signification sometimes ascribed to the words "in Christ" is altogether uncalled-for. In some other cases, the phrase is expressive of adherence or discipleship to Christ; just as the words "in circumcision" and "in uncircumcision" (Rom. iv. 10) denote discipleship to Judaism or the reverse.

It will be seen from these remarks that our author is not wholly free from the tendency into which it is so easy to fall—to allow the dogmatic system to which he is attached to suggest or dictate the interpretation to be put upon the words of Scripture. This is a tendency to which all are liable; but it is one that ought to be wisely guarded against. A remarkable instance of it in this volume really surprises us, occurring as it does in the pages of so able and thoughtful a writer. We allude to his twofold rendering of the word πνέυμα. Why does Dr. Farrar, in this case, adopt the form sometimes Ghost, and sometimes Spirit, for his rendering of the Greek word, which is always one and the same? Will it be said that personal attributes are in some passages ascribed to the Spirit, and justify the distinct rendering of Ghost, in harmony with the creeds and the doctrine of the Third Person. But in answer to this, is not the personality referred to simply figurative—exactly, such as we find in various other cases? Paul personifies Sin, Death, the Law, representing them as having power, exercising dominion, reigning over men, and being enemies. So it is with Charity (Love):—Charity suffereth long and is kind; envieth not; is not puffed up, and so on. Can personality be more distinctly implied than in such words? But as we do not in these cases suppose that a real personality is meant, so there is no necessity to do so and no propriety in doing so, in the case of πνέυμα. This word, as used in the New Testament, is one of the richest and most expressive words of Christianity. In its English form of Spirit, Holy Spirit, Spirit of God, Spirit of Christ, it carries with it the suggestion of the most precious Christian truth. The word Ghost, on the other hand, is objectionable on grounds which will occur to every thoughtful reader, and it cannot be used with any adjective but one.

Various other instances might easily be pointed out in this book of omission or commission, but the space at our command does not allow us to dwell upon them—with one exception. That is the Proem to the Fourth Gospel, on which a few concluding words are called for.

In many respects the explanations and comments on portions of this Gospel are excellent; but this remark does not apply to its commencement. While admitting that the doctrine of the Logos was no new revelation of Christianity, Dean Farrar does not notice that all the ideas expressed in the proem, with a single exception, are already found in the Jewish author Philo, many years, or rather decades, before the Fourth Gospel was written. Our author observes that "it remained for St. John to utilise the existing title [i.e., Logos] to apply it to the Incarnate Son of God, and to fill it with its proper plenitude of spiritual meaning." But truly the Evangelist fills the word

* "Texts Explained; or, Helps to understand the New Testament." By F. W. Farrar, D.D., &c Dean of Canterbury. Pp. xxv., 356. Longmans. 6s.

* The presence or absence of the article ought to be noted; while the lower meaning of the term God was familiar to the Apostle (1 Cor. viii. 6).

with no fuller plenitude of meaning than it already had in the mind of Philo so long before. He simply adds the statement that "the Logos became flesh" in Jesus; and this, indeed, with a far less plenitude of meaning than it has in Philo. And why, it may be asked, did not the other evangelists make use of what Dr. Farrar terms so great and unique a "plenitude"? or make any even the slightest allusion to it? Were they not acquainted with the true Messianic dignity of their Master? Had the Christian community to wait until the Logos ideas of Greek speculation came so long afterwards to be embodied in the Fourth Gospel, in order to learn who and what "Jesus the Prophet of Nazareth" (Matt. xxi. 2) really was? This is incredible; and so the fact remains that the Logos form of the Gospel is simply a late product of a particular school of philosophising Christians, derived originally not from the Teacher himself or his immediate disciples, but from those speculative converts of whom the author of the Gospel was most probably one; who were not contented to say with Peter at the Pentecost that Jesus was "a man approved of God," but that he was the Logos incarnate—a phrase which, if it have any meaning at all for our time, can only be taken to record the fact of the presence in Christ of the Divine Spirit and power of Him whois "the only true God."

As to the writing in which this peculiar mode of statement is found, our author, it will be observed, gives no hint of the doubt, and more than doubt, respecting its authorship. He accepts it without remark as a composition of the Apostle John. But this, I should think, he is well aware cannot be shewn with any reasonably convincing evidence. It is indisputable that the writer of the Gospel was familiar with the Logos philosophy to such a degree as renders it difficult to admit its authorship by John the Galilean fisherman. But on this point it is impossible to enlarge here.

In the foregoing remarks it has been suggested that the author of "Texts Explained" is too evidently under the bias of the dogmatic system to which he is attached, and that this, on certain subjects, unfits him to give a satisfactory historical exposition, in some important parts of his work. It may be said in reply, that the writer of these words must himself, too, be under a similar influence; that he also has written in harmony with, or at the dictation of, his special doctrinal beliefs; and that these are evidently Unitarian in character.

The retort is a fair one; but if to some extent it be admitted, still there is one important difference between the two cases. The reviewer is in no way bound or pledged to formularies, creeds, or articles, outside of the Scriptures. It would have saved him a good deal of thought and labour if he had been so; if he had had a whole scheme of doctrines ready drawn up for him, by some external authority, ancient or mediæval or Elizabethan, as the case might be. But such a position would not conduce to independent thought, or remove the responsibility attaching to every man in particular who assumes to be a teacher and guide of others in the way of truth. Happily, then, such is not his position; and he owes no allegiance to any special creed of Nicene or other Fathers. As a Unitarian he is free to follow and to teach what he sees, or thinks he sees, to be the substantial teaching of the Gospel; and this he can do, and has endeavoured to do, to the best of his power, without regard to any other interest but his own desire to know and confess the whole and simple truth; to make that truth known to others and help them to live in the faithful confession of it. And why should not the clergy and the ministers of every name, as men who love and desire the Truth in religion as in everything else, be equally free? G. V. S.

SPIRITUAL HEALING.*

THE author of these pages reveals a most pleasing personality—warm, moving and magnetic. That this should be so is the very essence of the principles upon which he bases the theory of life. It is plain that such an one must in a singular degree possess the force of his convictions. This little book is most persuasive. The difficulty is, of course, for the conventional mind to distinguish in this context sterling and earnest men from wanton empyricists, and actualities from vague and vain imaginings. Here we have an earnest and an honest man and nothing ventured which our ordinary experience may not almost immediately verify. From beginning to end this is a splendid plea for the freeing of the spirit. Christ proclaimed to man as none before had done with kindred strength the possibilities that this freedom opened to the human heart and soul even in its present position, which is only a subjugation because man is himself content to make it so. This freedom realised, then indeed is the Kingdom of God within us. On the Mount of Olives men were taught that the temporal and the eternal spheres should be united and at one. In these pages the term "Healing" is used in its truest and its deepest sense, and the system of treatment is one that never fails to perceive the dependence of the physical upon the spiritual. This may, doubtless, be followed out to an attenuated nicety, which would soon prove itself too fine, but still it would be well to contemplate for one moment how much our common medical practitioners have lost when they have ignored a fact which is in truth most deeply graven into life.

The author of this work asks pointedly enough, "What is the primal cause of illness and disease?" Some, he holds, will reply: "Germs, obsession, troubles of the stomach, a bad digestive and assimilative system, impatience in mastication, excessive bodily heat, or evil conditions for the due development of the necessary hygienic processes." Pertinently he points out the important fact that really, if we may adopt a general rule, only those persons get ill in an ordinary way who have the time, the money or the inclination. In brief, health or illth are largely affairs of will—the will to be well, or the will to be ill. So far so subjective, and these pages then reveal, with deep sincerity and obvious force, the objective power of sympathy as a factor in the healing order. From this point of vantage, for which much may be said, the whole of life is sympathy, and the whole of death, if the term be rightly used, is sympathy inert, or sympathy perverted.

Passing from the objective potency of sympathy in the work of healing, our author earnestly and convincingly leads us on to the converse theme—the kindred influence of subjective selfishness in causing illness, depression, and all manner of disease. Often men will attribute their want of vigour to what is here termed worriment, fear, dubiety, tension, distrust, disappointment, vexation, phases of the mind which beyond question may result from righteous wrath, or deepest human compassion, but which are assuredly far more frequently due to precedent selfishness, and which, too, although even in their origin they may have been sufficingly commendable, yet have an utter self-absorption as their almost inevitable consequence.

It is strange, and not less pathetic than curious, to note at times how many there are in this sphere who, deeming themselves possessed of the religious spirit, yet constantly in their best actions and their highest reflections and most soaring aspirations reveal an almost entire want of that consciousness of the Divine, which alone can mark the realm and the abiding rule of that faith which neither fails nor falters. The author of this little, yet healthy and helpful, book raises a kindred observation, as the result of contemplations, not in the higher, but in the less exalted phase of our existence, when he holds that there is really no room for both trouble and trust. The passage proceeds: "To lose self that one may find it is, in fact, the essence of healing, for invariably there is too great consciousness of self whenever there is illness and trouble." This last appears a hard saying, and the fact that it will be difficult even for the most candid to give it absolute and entire assent will make too many altogether oblivious to the deepest meaning and significance of these moving words. Later, in a splendid aphorism, the author reveals his whole philosophy in this inspiring utterance: "True healing means to trust God more."

Whether we regard this work as a physical, a mental, a moral, or a spiritual guide, it abundantly deserves perusal and where it may seem transcendental or obscure, it most merits a sympathetic and a generous interpretation.

OBITUARY.

MRS. LEYSON LEWIS.

A VERY gracious presence is taken from our midst by the death on Thursday week, at East Farleigh, Kent, of Mrs. Leyson Lewis, the third child and eldest surviving daughter of Dr. Martineau. When in 1832 Mr. and Mrs. Martineau removed from Dublin to Liverpool, they brought with them only the tender memory of their first child, a daughter who lived only for a few months, and of the family which was to grow up in their new home, the boy Russell, and Isabella, who had been born on March 19 of that year. She was thus in Liverpool the eldest daughter, a child of great quickness of apprehension and delight in learning. She and her brothers and sisters had in their parents their first and principal teachers, and she learnt Latin and Greek as well as modern languages. Her early religious associations were with Paradise-street Chapel and such teaching as we have in the "Endeavours after the Christian Life." When she was sixteen came the year spent with her parents and the other children in Germany, while Hope-street Church was being built. In that year, 1848, Mr. Leyson Lewis was also in Berlin, completing his University education, and among other young friends were Charles Beard and Richard Hutton, who shared the privilege of reading Plato with Mr. Martineau. It was to Mr. Lewis that in 1883 Mr. Beard dedicated the volume of his Hibbert Lectures, recording an unbroken friendship of thirty-five years, which must thus have begun during that winter at Berlin.

Hope-street Church was opened in October, 1849, and the family took up again the threads of their Liverpool life. What the eldest daughter must have been in the congregation and the home, sharing so largely her father's spirit, we can well imagine, and what keen regrets would mingle with the heartfelt wishes which went with her when, in 1853, she was married to Mr. Leyson Lewis. Henceforth her home was in the south, for Mr. Lewis was the only son of Mr. Israel H. Lewis, of Gallants, East Farleigh, near Maidstone, where he was an extensive hop and fruit grower.

Mr. and Mrs. Leyson Lewis lived from the first near his parents, and after their death, in the old home. Occupied with the care of his estate, Mr. Lewis always retained those literary and artistic interests which he shared with his wife, and theirs was a very hospitable house. Many friends have happy and grateful recollections of days spent with them in the enjoyment of the beautiful country, and the charm of their home life. In the spring of 1896 Mr. Lewis died at Rome, where they had gone by medical advice after his recovery from a severe illness. He had been a sufferer from constitutional asthma, and their happiness had frequently been clouded by anxiety on his account, borne always with great courage and sweetness by his wife.

After the sorrowful days in Rome, Mrs. Lewis returned to her lonely home to carry out all her husband's plans and wishes, to live for her friends and neighbours, in quiet deeds of kindness, and more and more for her father and sisters. She had spent Christmas in Gordon-square, and nursed two of her sisters, who were prostrate with influenza, but then was herself attacked, and returned home, where, on Jan. 4, she died, being in her sixty-eighth year. The funeral was on Monday at East Farleigh Church.

Thus a life, beautiful in true humility, and rich in many gracious gifts, has passed upon the heavenward way. It has not been given to her to minister to the last where she fain would have been, and yet there or here we know that the living bonds remain unbroken of the one family on earth and in heaven.

MRS. THOMAS YOUNG.

THE hand of the Great Reaper has been busy indeed during the past few weeks among the "ripened grain," and many a family is mourning the loss of a beloved parent, even while it thanks the Giver of All for the blessing of having enjoyed the rich fruits of such a life for so long a time.

Among those loving and true lives which have been withdrawn from earth during the past week—on Tuesday, Jan. 2 — is that of Dorcas Young, the mother of one daughter and of many sons, who "arise and call her blessed." Born in 1822, she was married in 1841 to Thomas Young, solicitor, of 29, Mark-lane, E.C., whom she survived three years. A mother before the age of twenty, she ever strove most earnestly to qualify herself for her sacred responsibilities, and with so much success that her children looked upon her not only as a dear mother whose will was to be reverenced and obeyed, but as a beloved sister and close companion with whom they could discuss all hopes and fears, all cares and troubles in the spirit of a loving equality.

On Saturday last a service was held at Newington Green Chapel, with which she and her family have been connected for over forty years, and afterwards the funeral took place at Abney Park Cemetery. In the unavoidable absence of the minister, the Rev. W. Wooding, who was away in Italy, the Rev. W. C. Bowie kindly officiated, and in the course of a beautiful and appropriate address, he said: "Mrs. Young, in the days of her strength, lived an earnest, strenuous life; her active mind, her strong will, her untiring industry, her good sense and womanly tact, enabled her to superintend the busy affairs of a large household, and to guide and train her family with a wisdom and zeal that were truly admirable. For upwards of half a century she was her husband's right hand; in early days, when he was occupied with city affairs, he knew full well that his growing family and his home were under wise and careful guidance, and required no serious thought or aid from him. The husband and father completed his honourable life more than three years ago; the wife and mother has now gone home too. Her life and work were completed and rounded off in a way which only a few attain. She lived to see her sons and her daughter all settled in homes of their own, and she had the satisfaction and joy of knowing that her fostering care was no longer necessary. . . . She is safe in God's keeping, where no harm can touch her. We remain here for a little longer. Let us strive to live and work so that we may prove worthy of the wise love and tender care bestowed upon us by our mothers."

MR. JAMES M'CLURE, MONEYREA.

IN the last moments of the dying year Mr. James M'Clure, of Merryland, breathed his last at the age of seventy-two years. He was one of the most respected and best beloved members of Moneyrea congregation, as was well attested by the very large attendance at his funeral, in most inclement weather on Jan. 2. Mr. M'Clure was, perhaps, the most omnivorous reader in the district. He was especially well read in the English poetry of the eighteenth century and of the earlier half of the nineteenth, and in the Irish and American poets. He had a very retentive memory and was able to illustrate any point in conversation with apt quotations from the poets, on the spur of the moment, better than many a litterateur could do after elaborate search with the aid of a dictionary of quotations! He was also a constant reader of literature on sociological topics, and though a strong Radical in politics, inclining to socialism, his views on current politics took often a turn of poetic insight rather than a baldly economic consideration of the problem. So his criticisms had often a touch of idealism and bright originality, in which his many friends found both charm and spiritual edification. In this respect he was an educational influence in the district. Indeed, it was seldom he talked for ten minutes to an old friend or a new acquaintance without recommending the reading of some book, often a new one, and, perhaps, offering the loan of it from his private library, which, though not large, was of as much service to the community as if it had been public property. As might be expected of a man of so fine and intellectual a temperament, he was a great favourite with the young. With a good fund of amusing anecdote, and a ready but always kindly humour, he made the time pass pleasantly for his friends. In argument he was a keen antagonist, often original in his methods and very persuasive. In religion he was among the broadest of the broad, always tolerant, able to see the grain of truth and the balance of good in all the Churches. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Richard Lyttle.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From a New Year's Greeting and Pastoral to the Worshippers at Hope-street Church, Liverpool, by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong.

To promote the Kingdom of God—to promote it in our own lives and in the lives of the world around—that is the end and aim of this Church of ours. And as we can never promote it in the world around unless it exists in ourselves, we may take that first as the end we are set to bring about.

And the chief means towards our end is worship—the conscious bowing of the soul before God, the attitude which tries to feel His presence about us and within us, and to be quiet and brave and strong, true and tender and loving in that presence. It is towards this that the melody of hymns, the solemn utterances of prayer, the preacher's words, are all intended to help. They are often very, very feeble—always inadequate. But if choir and preacher are all the while filled with a sense of that in which they are engaged, and never go to their task without self-dedication and consecration, then they never quite fail. But none the less, always the worshipper himself must be the chief agent, and must gather his soul to the purpose before him with sincerity and earnestness, forgiving his brother his trespass before he come to the altar; and where a Church is carried on in this spirit, there you do see character slowly strengthening, purifying, refining, as the years go on. The faithfulness tells. No vivid revivals. No tremendous effect, perhaps, at any one service. But the faithfulness tells. And of one thing I am quite certain, that we Hope-street folk, faulty as we are, and each of us with sad memories upon the conscience, and tempers or dispositions which sorely need mending, are nevertheless better men and women, less far off from the blessed Kingdom of God, than if we had never worshipped together, never felt the sympathy and fellowship of our common prayer, never mingled the streams of our lives in the meditations and emotions of this dear house of the Lord's praise.

Let the Kingdom of God arise and shine in us, and certain it is that from us the light and beauty of it will flow over to others with whom we have to do. It is right that every Church should have springing out of it many institutions of help and ministry to the young, to the poor, to all whom that Church can in any way help and guide and gladden. It is right, too, and most necessary, that the machinery of those institutions should be kept in the most efficient order possible. And so there must be many committees, many plannings, and contrivings, and consultings. But the real vital good of all these institutions depends on deeper things than the machinery, though that is no excuse for carelessness about the machinery. It depends on the Kingdom of God within us the workers. If we are religious, there will be true religion in the institutions. If the spirit of love be in us, the spirit of love will be in our institutions. And religion and the spirit of love, these are the Kingdom of God.

A quiet, inconspicuous trust it is that is laid upon us, but still a trust from God, just the trust for which, I suppose, He sees us to be fit; at any rate, the trust which we—you and I—are called on to fulfil. And by the fixed law of the spiritual universe, if we are faithful in this, then wider and larger trusts will come to us in God's good time. Part of the trust is to think and speak kindly of one another, to let no little irritations of any kind disturb our unity in the spirit; and part of it is always to be ready to help one another if we can. Be faithful in the small things and few. And be sure, one day the blessing shall fall on your ears too, the "well done" which those two faithful servants won from him who had given them their task, laid upon them the responsibility of their special trust.

And then, lest we should think that faithfulness in the Church is all, let us realise that we can never really be faithful in the Church unless we are faithful also in the home, and faithful in the silent times when none is present save God alone, and His Spirit seeks our spirit to purify and bless. Let not Church and home be rival claims. Adjust their places to the best of your judgment in the court of conscience. Let each re-act upon the other for good. Home is where God set you first. Smooth down the angles of irritation. Bear and forbear in your own household. Consider and respect one another's special idiosyncrasies and characteristics. Sympathise and encourage and help. Never sneer and never snub. For the home is a more ancient temple than the Church itself.

And let neither Church nor home get between you and God. The deepest life of the soul must be that of the chamber and the solitude. It is there that from day to day, as you find out what are your difficulties, your temptations, your weaknesses, you must quietly seek strength for your battles and the Spirit of God for your shield and defence. Enter into your chamber and pray, and then go forth, serenity upon your brow, to the other home-rooms, and to the Church, and to the world, with all their trials, and all their glorious opportunities.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Our Father, who art in heaven."

THERE is no prayer so often used by Christian people all over the world as what we call the Lord's Prayer, the prayer which Jesus gave to his disciples as an example of how it was good for them to pray. I expect you all know the words by heart; but the older we grow and the more earnestly we use the prayer, the more of beautiful meaning we find in it. I want to take the prayer sentence by sentence, and help you, if I can, to understand it better and to feel more deeply what it means.

First come the words "Our Father, who art in heaven." Jesus always thought of God as Father, and it is the best thought of all. When we speak to God in our prayer, we ought always to begin by remembering that He is our Father. Very quietly and reverently we should think of Him, with trust and thankfulness, because He loves us and cares for us all. And we ought not to think that He is a long way off. God is everywhere. He is in the glorious heavens, but He is also with us here, and when we just think the thoughts of prayer in our hearts, He hears and understands. That is very wonderful, and we cannot fully understand it; but so it is. And when we say "Our Father, who art in heaven," I think the best way is to remember that where God is, it must be heaven, and when we draw near to Him in our prayer, we may feel the touch of His love, because He is our Father, and very humbly have some share in the joy of heaven.

All the other sentences of the Lord's Prayer grow out of this one thought, that God is our Father, and whatever I can say about them will help to make its meaning clearer; but let us now think quite simply of what we ought to feel towards God as our Father.

Living with our father, we have a good home.

He cares for us, and wants us to grow up wise and good.

He helps and teaches us.

If we are hurt, he comforts us, and helps us to bear pain and other hard things.

If we do wrong, he is sorrowful, and we are ashamed to look in his face.

But if we are really sorry, he forgives, and helps us to do better; and even if he punishes us, we know it is because he loves us, and it is part of the teaching, to help us to be brave and true.

Is not that what we must feel about our Father? God gives us our own homes, and our own father and mother, with all their love and tenderness for us. If ever you are ready to be afraid of God, because of His greatness, remember that, and that as He wishes them to be so tender and loving to you, He is the same; He is our heavenly Father. Do not be afraid of Him, only be afraid of doing wrong.

And as you are happy in your home, in its good order, in being helpful yourself, in the love which makes it really home, so be sure that we may learn to be happy and trustful with God, our Father, wherever we are in the world, learning what is its good order, and how we are to be helpful, and how only wrong-doing can separate us from Him.

Are any of you afraid of being alone in the dark? But if you feel mother's hand holding yours, you know it is all right. So we learn to feel safe, because God is with us, holding us in His care.

If a light is brought in, then you see that there was nothing to be afraid of. God's love is a great light for us in the world. When we learn to trust in Him as our Father, we see there is nothing really to be afraid of, unless we go away from Him in wrong-doing.

A little child, that had just learnt to walk, once toddled out of the house, where a door had been left open, and was for the first time alone in the open street. Very soon it was frightened by the noise and strange faces. It did not know which way to turn or how to get home again. Then in a moment it was caught up and held closely in mother's arms. It had not seen who came so quickly behind, but no other arms hold like that, and the child at once nestled down feeling safe and happy; and soon the noise of the street was gone, and there was home again, and the dear face, and voices of the other children. So it may be with us, when we begin really to feel that God is our Father, and that we are closely held in His loving care, and this beautiful world is our home.

Do you know the story of Jack March, and Daddy Darwin's Dove-cote? He was a poor workhouse lad, without a home, but over the high wall of the workhouse garden he used to watch old Darwin's beautiful tumbler pigeons, flying about in the sunny air, and he longed to have the birds to care for and to have a home of his own. So he wrote a letter to the queer old man, who lived all alone; and the story tells how he got his wish, and how useful and happy he was in his new home. When one thinks of the lonely little lad, and what it was to him to be allowed to love and care for the beautiful birds, and to be helpful to the old man, it makes us feel more deeply what we have to be thankful for in our homes. And we may all gain that great happiness, for which we long, to know that it is God who makes our home beautiful, and that He loves and cares for us all.

These are some of the things to think about, to show how much there is in the words "Our Father, who art in heaven."

Do that which is assigned to thee, and thou canst not hope too much, or dare too much.—Emerson.

THE PLOUGHMAN ON THE PLAIN.

THE war news has contained many things to sadden us: some to dim the eyes with pride in the self-denying heroism of the combatants; some to stir our righteous indignation. In other items, and these perhaps the most casually reported, there is much suggestion; and, to our mind, in few more than in that which was given by a correspondent describing a recent action on the banks of the Tugela. While the British host was moving forward amidst the roar of artillery, answered from the scattered heights on the other side of the river, the writer says he saw below his point of observation a solitary Kaffir peacefully ploughing in a field. The apparent unconcern of the ploughman evidently struck home to the mind of the observer, and it is certainly a matter for reflection that at least one humble brother man that day was going on peacefully with his day's work, despite the exciting tumult of the guns and the too evident signs of carnage and destruction. One would like to get to the bottom of that ploughman's mind, and to see how much virtue of the rarer sort was there, and how much his action was due to use and wont and the sheer incapacity to understand.

Failing any chance of solving such a problem, the man there, ploughing steadily and along his allotted acre may be to all of us a symbol, and to some of us an exhortation. There are such men about us all the while, and many of them known to us as by no means insensible beings, to whom the noise of conflict is inexplicable or indifferent. To others it may be given to play the part of the fighters; these are the ploughmen on the plain. Probably a good many of those others would be more at home, or at any rate would be better employed, if they were simply ploughing also. There needs must be conflict, no doubt. Controversialists must engage in the warfare of ideas. He who wilfully lets the truth be worsted is a traitor to a kingdom not of this world. But, then, the truth is many-sided, and men of equal earnestness and devotion may find themselves ranged in determined, and even in stern opposition. As the Boer in defence of a free fatherland meets with a Briton championing an imperial policy which he understands as the finest ideal of citizen liberty the world has seen, so it is in forms of strife which are none the less real because unattended by bloodshed, and which go on not for a campaign or two, but through the generations and centuries. Shall the priest be the predominant factor in Christendom, or shall the principle of spiritual liberty extend to its utmost? Are the ideas of the ancients to limit the thoughts of the moderns in theology or in ethics any more than in politics and science? The conflict is now keener, now duller; but it goes on, and few signs of its end can be seen.

We can have no word to urge against the true battle of ideas, where truth, and not personal or party advantage, is the thing desired, and where, not to be outdone by those who use the carnal weapons of the battlefield, the combatants cultivate the virtues of gentlest chivalry towards the defeated, and of manly heroism in the defence of the things committed to their charge. No; in a world where "not peace but a sword" must sometimes be the Gospel motto, it were folly to deprecate the exercise of reason and criticism, or to undervalue the service of the man who with keen logic rightly divides truth from error. It is a false charity that ignores vital issues. It is no true "breadth" in theology that blurs out the distinctions between opposed conceptions and irreconcileable ideals. A man may be truly broad, and yet be most faithful as an exponent of the truth as it comes to him. "Preach doctrine," said PHILLIPS BROOKS, one of the truest of Broad Churchmen, "preach all the doctrine you know. But," added he, most pregnantly, "preach it always not that men may believe it, but that men may be saved by believing it." Doubtless many, if not most, battling theologians mean that, or meant it at some stage of their career; but at times a different mood seems to prevail, and the humble man of heart must be pardoned if then he turns from the din and smoke and goes on with his ploughing. Let the preachers preach, and the books multiply, and the sounding strife go on. He is down there, on the plain, teaching children in the Sunday-school, or at home. He is helping people to be honest and thrifty and wholesome-minded, giving them honest laughter to drive away ugly feelings, opening the books of Nature's wonders to them, or leading them in one of a thousand unobtrusive paths along the upward slope. It may be that, as he ploughs, his furrow lies close by the hedge-row, where no one sees him at all, outside of a very narrow margin; but he just goes on. He is a straight workman, or a clean-handed trader. He earns his wages. He cares for his home, and endows his children with precious memories every happy day they live. Ask him what sect or party he belongs to—he can tell you readily and intelligently—this, that, or none. Ask him what his creed is—he has his sympathies and dare avouch them. But he has no taste for smoke, and no desire to cut any opponent to pieces. Leave him a field to plough, some place where he may woo the fertile earth to yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness—it is enough.

We read in one of the non-canonical scriptures that JESUS once observed a man ploughing on the Sabbath day, and that he approved the man—if he knew what he was doing. Mere, stupid, unintelligent drudgery we do not praise. But we are grateful for those who, knowing well that the battle is raging, and understanding why, nevertheless can so control their lives as to go on with the day's good work. If there is any soul at all in this dreadful fighting in the South—a matter which we dare not doubt, but which is terribly hard to believe—it surely aims at multiplying the men who plough the earth in quiet duty and abiding peace, and in every way help GOD'S world to be a blessing to GOD'S children. And the campaigns of the creeds ought to mean nothing less than the increase of their numbers who, undisturbed by cries of orthodox or heretic, go on with the day's duty, preparing for greater harvests by and by. Such campaigns cannot well have higher aims, and he who has helped men to live so, and to be wisely content therewith, has not lost the victory—whatever men may say of his standards, or he, poor man, may think of other things he failed to win.

ORARE EST LABORARE.

LABOUR is prayer: I doubt not, I,
That honest work doth gain the sky,
Not grudged an humble entrance there,
As the poor fleshly way of prayer.
Yea, God's wide heart hath room, I think,
For sparrow's chirp and hammer's chink.

But thou, sweet soul, whom God bids lie
And list the loud world rumbling by,
I tell thee never loom or mart
Burned better work-light than thy heart.
Lie still, and serve thy God, thy neighbour,
For thee, meek sufferer, prayer is labour.

"BACK TO JESUS."

SIR,—I trust I shall not weary your readers if I reply to Mr. Bennett's very interesting and able letter. Mr. Bennett's theology is, I now see clearly, very different from mine, and I think from that of the majority of the members of our Free Churches. In most other Churches we should begin to accuse each other of heresy and try to drive each other out. That is absolutely impossible amongst us, if we have the slightest understanding of our Free Church principles. We each have an equal right to be where we are and to preach our Gospel, and shall, I trust, remain good friends and fellow-workers for truth and righteousness. Mr. Bennett expects his views to prevail amongst us in spite of "our vaunt of openness to new aspects of truth being sometimes accompanied by a singular indisposition to recognise them when they appear." I hope with all my heart they will prevail if it is only blindness and bigotry which would prevent it.

But there is always a danger that we should think those blind who do not see what we see or think we see, and Mr. Bennett, with his strong decided opinions, will admit that he needs the caution as much as any of us.

Mr. Bennett seems to think there is serious inconsistency between the words that Jesus "inspired, if not initiated, the greatest movement for the uplifting of mankind that history has known," and my belief that if Jesus is the one perfectly convincing proof of God's goodness, "our faith in God hangs not on history in general, but on one tiny thread." There is no inconsistency between the belief that the life and teachings of Jesus were the beginning of the Christian Church and the belief that witness to God's goodness is borne by myriads, both within and without that Church as well as by Jesus. It would seem to me terrible that our conviction of God's love should depend on any one person or event in history. Indeed, with Mr. Bennett, apparently, this all-important conviction depends absolutely on a particular theory of God's revelation through Christ. Mr. Bennett would probably object to the word theory and prefer experience. But I cannot see how the experience can justify denial of God's revelation through other sources, or how even it can completely justify itself without a particular theory of the nature of Christ and the meaning of the Gospels. However sure I might be that my own theory of the New Testament was right, and that Strauss or Baur or Renan was absolutely wrong, I should regard it as a terrible thing if any conceivable results of Biblical criticism could destroy my faith in God's love. I know that Mr. Bennett and his school are anxious to avoid this, which seems to me their fundamental difficulty, and that they do so by dwelling on their own immediate experience of Jesus through the Gospels and through Christian history. Harnack, in a famous little lecture, has dealt with this objection, which seems to me so strong, that "the facts of history can never be known with a certainty that would entitle us to make them the objects of our religious belief." Like many another fair-minded apologist, he has put the objection very well and then fails to produce the conviction that he has answered it.

Mr. Bennett seems to think I don't understand the Ritschlian dislike of mysticism. There is nothing in their tenets which I think I understand so well or dislike so much. Hermann, in his striking book, "Communion with God," says about mysticism: "The Christian must pronounce the mystic's experience of God to be a delusion." That sentence has always repelled me more than anything else from his position. It means, I suppose, that Wordsworth was suffering under a delusion when he felt God's love among the mountains, and that all our poets and prophets are mistaken when they feel God's goodness unless they see it in the face of Jesus Christ.

I agree entirely with Mr. Bennett in thinking the conception of a good-natured God a most inadequate and unsatisfactory one. I do not know why he should credit me with such a superficial thought. On the other hand, God's love seems to me revealed to us in other ways than in the forgiveness of sins. Our churches have, no doubt, often thought too little of sin and God's relation to it. That explains a reaction which make's God's forgiveness of sins the all-important thing. But it seems to me, like most reactions, to run into an opposite extreme and to make too little of God's love in times of suffering, and sorrow, and temptation.

But in all this Mr. Bennett and I have been wandering, perhaps unavoidably, some way from the original discussion. That discussion turned on Mr. Armstrong's book and his aim to lead the Christian world to the religion of Jesus. It seemed to me that Mr. Bennett's and Mr. Drummond's criticisms on that aim showed that they wanted not the religion of Jesus, but the religion of his disciples. To Jesus God the Father was all in all.

For John and Paul God was to be approached through Jesus and through Jesus alone. The religion of Jesus was not their ideal, but religion through Jesus. Which is to be our ideal of the religious life of the soul? I may be wrong in thinking that Mr. Drummond and Mr. Bennett prefer the latter; but it is quite clear that Mr. Armstrong prefers the former, and that the aim of his book is to show that the religion of Jesus ought to be our ideal and not the religion of John.

HENRY GOW.

SIR,—Mr. Armstrong has no need of my assistance in the controversy which has arisen over his recent work, nor should I be moved from the position of an interested listener, were it not for the accusation made in Mr. Bennett's last letter against those "who move in circles where the vaunt is made of openness to new aspects of truth from whatever quarter they arise," that they manifest "a singular indisposition to recognise such new aspects of truth when they appear."

Why is it, then, that some of us who do make this our vaunt are so slow to accept the Ritschlian theory, which commends itself to Mr. Bennett and to others whose names are had in honour of us all? I answer the question for myself alone.

First, I confess to an "indisposition," not I think at all "singular," but natural and salutary, to accepting the "new," especially in matters directly appertaining to religion. We are, perhaps, none of us cautious enough in the reception we give to new theories in matters of history, criticism, science, medicine, sociology; but in all these we ought to be ever prepared for discoveries, knowing how often new facts have come to light which have altered all previous beliefs. So when a friend tells me that the Fourth Gospel was really the first committed to writing I am utterly indisposed to receive his theory as true, but, nevertheless, quite prepared to consider any new evidence which he may bring forward to substantiate his assertion. But Religion, the relation of the human soul to God, is an abiding fact. It does not admit of the new; as well talk of new aspects of the relation of child to mother. I disbelieve a priori in novelty when the fundamentals of human experience are concerned. In the course of ages that experience may be deepened and confirmed, but it is always old as the soul itself which is the subject of it. The most enlightened Christian can get no nearer to God than did the Israelite who wrote, "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God," and "As the hart pants after the water-brooks, so pants my soul for Thee!" So amid all the changes of faith and knowledge which nineteen centuries have witnessed the pre-Christian Psalms have remained the highest expression of Christian aspiration and trust. There is nothing "new" in religion to him who has learnt so much.

Secondly, Mr. Bennett's "new aspect of truth," which he finds fault with us for not recognising, is founded upon the fallacious basis of individual conviction. It is true that he himself recognises this, and accordingly would "go back two thousand years to discover by historical analysis that there is a Christ of history who answers to the Christ of experience." But how many have the requisite learning, ability, leisure to do this? And, when done, how little worth is the appeal from an a priori conviction to the authority of written documents? The history of religion is full of instances of good and learned men who have searched the Scriptures, only to find there that which they themselves brought. To-day the pious Roman Catholic kneels before the tabernacle, behind whose locked door in golden pyx lies the consecrated host—a wafer made of flour and water and stamped with a cross, that, and no more, it is to the Protestant—to him it is Jesus Christ, God and man, soul and body, He who died upon the cross, rose again and ascended into heaven, and day by day gives himself for the support and consolation of his church on earth veiled to mortal senses under the appearances of bread and wine. Laugh at him, argue with him, demonstrate to him the absolute impossibility of it all; you will make not the slightest impression. He knows—knows with a far higher certitude than the evidence of senses can afford, or argument of reason give him.

But if he be a man of education and of inquiring mind, he goes back to the original records of Christian faith, and with Mr. Bennett he discovers there "that the Christ of history answers to the Christ of experience." He finds the Christ who gives himself to-day under the form of bread answer to the Christ of the Gospels who himself gave the bread, saying, "This is my body," and declared "The bread I give is my flesh." He finds that transubstantiation is manifestly taught of Jesus and his apostles. If it seems otherwise to us, it is only because we do not bring the doctrine to the book in which we seek confirmation of it.

The objects of conviction differ in every community, but the strength of it is the same in all. Said the Mahommedan carpenter to Francis William Newman, after a patient hearing of his arguments on behalf of Evangelical Christianity: "I will tell you, sir, how the case stands—God has given to you English a great many good gifts. You have ships and soldiers and manufactories and learning. But there is one thing God has withheld from you and has revealed to us; and that is the knowledge of the true religion, by which one may be saved."

But there is this great difference between "new aspects of truth" and old, that the latter can appeal from individual experience to the support of multitudes, among them many of the wisest and best of mankind. It is not by himself alone that the Roman Catholic kneels in worship of the Host; millions throughout the world to-day approve what we call his folly, and he can summon the witnesses of a thousand years of Christendom in corroboration of his faith. So, too, may the Buddhist, the Mussulman, the Anglican, the Calvinist, each and every follower of an ancient and numerous religious body, defend his personal conviction of truth by falling back into the multitude which is ever behind him. But the man who thinks he has discovered a new aspect of truth stands alone, or with few companions; and the immense multitudes, who all hold (as he does) by an inward conviction, are all arrayed together as evidence against him, that whether they be right or wrong, he is certainly wrong as differing from them all.

Thirdly—and this seems to me the gravest of all objections to this and like new theories, orthodox or heretical—this new aspect of truth is narrowly sectarian and rigidly exclusive. It is "a terrible thing," indeed, to use Mr. Gow's words, if so be that it be true. "A belief in the goodness of God," writes Mr. Bennett, "which is derived apart from Christ is of no value for religion." Alas, then, for the human race, God abandoned except for the small portion to whom this last 1900 years Christ has been known!

For is not a belief in the goodness of God the one foundation of all real religion? The good-natured Deity whom alone we are permitted to know without Christ is no object of trust and worship, our feeling towards Him will be similar to His feeling towards us. He wishes us well and we wish Him well in turn. Far other is He whom our own souls reveal to us, Infinite in all perfection we can conceive, and in perfections beyond our small capacity of conceiving. Infinite, therefore, in Power and in Justice, nor less so in Mercy and in Love. What is to be said otherwise of men like Mr. Voysey, and us all who yield not a whit to Ritschlian or Trinitarian Christian in our belief in God's Goodness? We are excommunicate and excommunicated by men who are themselves shut out from the communion of all the older Churches! We don't know God's Goodness!

For myself I fully agree with Mr. Gow that the work of Christ "was the greatest movement for the uplifting of mankind that history has known," and I do not understand how, as an historical fact, this can be denied. I admit very lovingly and thankfully my obligations to the great Teacher, of whom our Western folk have learnt to call God, Father, and man a brother. But I will not magnify my gratitude to him by denying, what the facts to-day and from of old teach, that God has given "other names of power" to men; nor will I join with his disciples to forbid those who follow not with me, nor refuse them the knowledge of God I claim for myself. CHARLES HARGROVE.

MYSTICISM.

SIR,—Some of your correspondents, in dealing with the question "Back to Jesus," seem unable to decide the definition of Mysticism. Goethe, who knew everything, settles the question in one of his pregnant maxims:—"Mysticism is the scholastic of the heart, the dialectic of the feelings." A pious woman was lately reported to have said:—"'Tisn't what men have said or written that's given me peace all my days and happiness now that I'm an old woman. If every line of the Bible was proved to be false, if all the learned men in the world came to the door and told me that I was an old goose, it wouldn't make no difference. It's what I know that makes me happy and sure—so sure. Nobody can teach me, and nobody can take it from me." From these words of the wise man and the uncultured peasant we may learn the essence of true religious mysticism.

THE "ENGLISH PRESBYTERIANS."

SIR,—It is usually expected, I think, that the author of a book shall silently and respectfully accept the verdict of a reviewer and be thankful to the Press if he obtains any notice at all.

I am, therefore, properly grateful to your reviewer for the amount of space he has devoted to my book on "Protestant Dissent," and especially for one or two kind things he has said about it.

But he has thrown down a kind of challenge in his discussion of an important point which fills nearly the whole of his article, and I should be greatly obliged to you if you will permit me to offer some further justification for the views I have published and for which I am taken to task.

I am blamed for being controversial; but I only aimed at correcting some popular errors; even an historian cannot help appearing to be controversial if he tries to settle disputed points.

In re-reading my book, not an agreeable task to an author, it seems to me that the most controversial section is that in which I deal with the meeting-houses and "Open Trusts," which your reviewer himself regards as "the strongest and most interesting part of the book," and he is good enough further to describe it "as a really valuable contribution to the story of English Unitarianism." If I have committed a fault in being controversial, I think I may claim that this is a condonation of it.

I may also claim that my opinion of the Presbyterians (properly so-called) is in accordance with the "judgment of history"; your reviewer himself admits that in the Commonwealth times they were the most intolerant of the Puritans and bitterly opposed to any idea of religious liberty.

I might very well have treated these Presbyterians to a mere passing notice, and have begun with the Presbyterian dissenters after the Revolution, whom I think Unitarians generally mean when they speak of English Presbyterians; but the insistence of Dr. Martineau, in his Leeds address, upon our historic connection with the Presbyterians of the Commonwealth compelled me to take him at his word. I think he was wrong in taking this leap of 250 years, but he had to do it in order to find a precedent for his proposed new Presbyterian Church; he could find no English Presbyterianism of later date. Very few Unitarians will own the relationship.

Before going into details let me say at once that the whole misunderstanding arises from the misuse of the word Presbyterian, for the mere continued use of the name proves nothing as to historical continuity.

Presbyterian denotes an ecclesiastical distinction, and was properly used of those who, from Cartwright to the Restoration, had a preference for a Church organised on the Presbyterian model. It has not been, in this correct and proper sense, applicable to any body of English Nonconformists or Dissenters since the Revolution, except in the case of the denomination known as the Presbyterian Church of England.

Between the Restoration and the Revolution, "Presbyterian" was used in a much looser sense, as synonymous with Puritan; it was applied to good Churchmen who only scrupled about some detail of the Church service; it was equally applied to "godly" persons who kept themselves aloof from the profligate habits of the times; much as "Methodist" was a hundred years later.

It is after the Revolution, then, that we must look for evidence of our connection with the English Presbyterians as they are called, or more properly the Protestant dissenters called Presbyterian. It is only in this period that the Presbyterians are alleged to have been distinguished from the Independents by their greater liberality.

I have sought in vain for proof of this distinction. Evidence is now before me, gathered from Congregational usage, ordination services, sermons, trust deeds and legal opinions of the eighteenth century, enough to fill many columns of THE INQUIRER, but it all goes to show that, amongst the Protestant Dissenters, Presbyterian and Independent were distinctions without a difference. There was no peculiarity in the polity of those called Presbyterian which favoured liberal opinions any more than among the Independents; the majority of the Presbyterian congregations remained orthodox, and there are at least 70, and probably 100 of them, at one time known as Presbyterian, which are now known as Congregational.

My critic reminds me that I have not done justice to the union between the Presbyterian and Independent Dissenting ministers, the United Brethren or United ministers, as they were called. I admit it, and am grateful to him for the reminder. I had too much in mind the temporary differences between some of the London ministers, but in the country generally, I believe, no such differences occurred. This only emphasises the absence of any distinction. There was no universal uniformity of Congregational usages, but differences existed amongst the Independents as well as amongst those called Presbyterians. The general practices were the same; Presbyterian and Independent ministers took part together in ordination services and succeeded one another in pulpits, the congregations recognising no difference between them.

As to the effect of the agreement Whiston said: "The usually esteemed three denominations are thereby in a good degree reduced to two." The only distinction of importance amongst the dissenters was between the Pædobaptists (Presbyterian and Independent) and the Anti-Pædobaptists.

In some parts of the country the name Presbyterian was used generally "by the vulgar" to denote "Dissenter," but Mr. Job Orton is reported to have said: "We never had the distinction between Presbyterian and Independent in this part of the kingdom and it is idle and insignificant everywhere."

"These United Brethren, as they called themselves, might all, properly enough, be called Independents. However, the names (Presbyterian and Independent) are now promiscuously used by others, and they are called indifferently by either of those names." (Dr. Zachary Grey—Preface to "Hudibras," 1744.)

It would be easy enough to give instances of a liberal policy and a liberal tendency amongst the Independents, but that might be considered outside the immediate question. For my present purpose it is sufficient to show that Presbyterians and Independents formed practically one body, and it is not too much to say that, however liberal the Presbyterians may have become, they were first taught to be liberal by the Independents. I said "the Presbyterians were merged in the general body of Dissenters." I should have been more definite, and at the same time more accurate, had I said they became indistinguishable from the Independents. I have already given some evidence of this. I will give similar evidence from chapel trust deeds.

The deeds of the Tooting Chapel (1726-1766) (the subject of an important lawsuit in 1888) speak of the "Presbyterian or Independent denomination" (in the singular). Mr. Justice Kekewich held that it referred to one denomination called either Independent or Presbyterian; and the Rev. Andrew Mearns says, "The adjectives are not here used as strict alternatives, but as alternative or party names indifferently applied to one and the same thing."

"Such as are usually termed or called Protestant Dissenting ministers or Presbyterian ministers." (Trust Deed, Horwick, Lancashire, 1729.) "And such other Presbyterian ministers (usually so-called in a large sense as comprehending Protestant ministers dissenting from the Church of England) as shall succeed him." (Trust Deed, Windle, Lancashire, 1710.)

These quotations are, perhaps, sufficient to show that Presbyterian was synonymous with Protestant Dissenter or Independent well into the latter half of the eighteenth century.

In London alone the distinction was kept alive by the body of Presbyterian ministers in and about the cities of London and Westminster, and this is the only body which can claim a continuous use of the name from the early part of the eighteenth century, though now they are a mere remnant.

We come, then, to the fourth use of the name Presbyterian, when, towards the close of the last century, it was arbitrarily used to denote a doctrinal distinction. (Dr. Abraham Rees, "Encyclopædia," 1786.)

No doubt the rules of the Congregational Fund Board helped to fix this distinction (which was doctrinal and not historical), as its grants were confined to orthodox ministers whether they were called Presbyterian or Independent. The Evangelicals dropped these distinctions, and following the example of the Fund called themselves Congregational. The unorthodox remnant, many of whom were Independents, were called Presbyterians, only apparently because they were excluded from the Congregational Fund. It may have had a sort of reference to the other Fund, called Presbyterian, though the Presbyterian Board had not made any distinction; it was founded by the joint action of Presbyterians and Independents, and certainly up till 1771, and probably much later, made grants impartially to ministers of both kinds.

Mr. Wilson, in his "Historical Inquiry," says: "I believe the fact of ministers in the country receiving from one of these funds was the circumstance which, generally speaking, gave distinction to the congregations over which they presided." Mr. Gordon appears to be of the same opinion; so that if a poor minister in the country was, on account of his opinions, excluded from the benefits of the Congregational Fund, and received assistance from the Presbyterian Fund, he was called a Presbyterian, because he was an Arian or a Unitarian. And "this," says Mr. Gordon, "is the precarious ground on which Unitarians claim an English Presbyterian ancestry."

It is not correct, therefore, to say that "the Presbyterians who had begun by being the narrowest of Nonconformists, gradually became the widest." The true state of the case is, that the name which was properly used to denote an intolerant ecclesiastical party in the reign of Charles I. was arbitrarily and improperly given to the most liberal dissenters about 150 years later; there was no historic relation between the two. How much this was felt and deprecated by the Unitarians may be gathered from the correspondence upon the subject which runs, at frequent intervals, through the first twenty volumes of the Monthly Repository.

Another example of the arbitrary use of the name in this way is to be found in Hook's "Church Dictionary." Mr. Hadfield, in the Preface to the "Manchester Socinian Controversy," gives a summary of 170 chapels of "orthodox foundation" in the possession of Unitarians; many of these were Baptist and many Independent, or simply Protestant Dissenting. Hook calls the whole 170 "Presbyterian," because "Presbyterian and Socinian have become synonymous terms"!

This arbitrary distinction, however, was not quite universal. I know of two Congregational chapels in this neighbourhood which were called Presbyterian well into the present century. One of them was a striking instance of the "promiscuous" use of names. It is "within a hundred miles" of Barton-street. According to the "Gloucester Guide," published at irregular intervals, this chapel was known as "Independent" (1792), "Independent-Presbyterian" (1802), "Presbyterian" (1817), and "Independent" again in 1827. This is all the more striking, as from 1793 to 1832 there was the same minister of whose orthodoxy there can be no question.

I think, then, I was justified in saying that we do not inherit from the Presbyterian dissenters exclusively but from the three denominations, if three they may be called. And this is not only historically true but what we might naturally expect; men are very much alike by whatever name they are called, and in every denomination there will be found some who are for standing still, and some, generally in a minority, who are for moving on.

But though I claim for our congregations an ancestry no less broad than the whole field of Protestant Dissent, I do not forget how much we owe to Theophilus Lindsey and the noble band of Churchmen who took the lead among Unitarians more than a hundred years ago. And it is a striking commentary upon the English Presbyterian theory of our origin that it is to Essex Chapel, founded by a Churchman, that Unitarian pilgrims from all parts of the earth wend their way. THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR,—I quite agree with your correspondent from the North that it is "improper" "to intrude controversial political articles" into the columns of a religious periodical; but since, sir, you think "we can and ought to discuss such questions," you cannot, in fairness, refuse to hear both sides. It may be taken for granted that every one joins in the prayer to be delivered from War, Pestilence, and Famine; but some of us cannot help seeing that at this moment peace could only be obtained by basely betraying those loyal Colonists who are helping us and trusting us. It is now nearly twenty years since we purchased peace by what is now called a magnanimous action, but which was then more correctly described as a disgraceful surrender, a wicked and cowardly desertion of subjects whom we were pledged to help and protect. We were warned then of just punishment to come, and we are now suffering. Our only excuse was that at that time we did not know what Boer government meant. We can no longer plead ignorance. If it were possible by repeating the crime of 1881 to obtain a respite from our present troubles, or even to conclude a most dishonourable peace, it would be an action at which Europe would have every reason to "stand aghast," and no one could contemplate without dismay the consequences to ourselves and to humanity at large.

27, Nassington-road, N.W.

SIR,—I have been watching with considerable interest what response there would be to Mr. Wicksteed's noble and manly words about the war in your issue of December. I am quite sure that there must have been a silent response in many a heart, and that it is only because there is such an evident wish that politics should not be discussed in the columns of THE INQUIRER that fuller expression of approval and sympathy has not been called forth.

On this account I will not discuss the matter here, though I deplore the fact that THE INQUIRER is not bearing more active witness to the great principles of Peace and Righteousness at a time when the Press has almost entirely been captured by the Jingoes.

I should, however, like to take this opportunity of drawing attention to the excellent set of pamphlets and leaflets issued by the Transvaal Committee, St. Ermin's Hotel, Westminster, giving dispassionate and (in the main) accurate information on the past and present causes of the war. Anyone sending a few stamps to the hon. secretary, to the above address, may obtain these, and, I believe, there are many of your readers who will be glad of the opportunity of reading this literature, and circulating it in quarters where ignorance prevails.

We may not be able to influence the decision of Ministers or to alter the immediate course of events. We can help gradually to educate the national conscience, and it is a solemn obligation laid on each of us to do all we can in this matter. FLORENCE HILL.

TEMPERANCE PUBLICATIONS.

SIR,—I must ask space just to say that I did not write without facts to cause my inquiry.

I have asked in both bookrooms for anything helpful in working a Band of Hope, and been told they had nothing. I am glad to hear that the Essex Hall Temperance Association's publications are kept there, and hope that Mr. Edwards' appeal may result in an increase of funds which will enable that list to be largely added to, if there is no hope of having their recommended books on view.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

WELCOME TO THE REV. ERNEST BETHAM.

A MEETING was held on Friday week in the Free Christian Church, Tyler-street, to welcome the Rev. Ernest Betham as the first settled minister of the church. Among those present were the Revs. Joseph Wood (Vice-President of the Midland Christian Union), J. Estlin Carpenter, J. Harrison, and Rudolf Davis and Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C.

A hearty welcome having been extended to Mr. Betham by a member of the Stratford congregation,

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD said that he was there in place of the Rev. L. P. Jacks, President of their Union, who was unable to be present. Having assured Mr. Betham of a warm welcome from his brother ministers in the district, Mr. WOOD said they would be glad to welcome him into the work of the Midland Christian Union. The Union, as they knew, had been largely responsible for the starting of that cause in Stratford. It was also doing a considerable amount of work in other parts of the district which it covered, and they would be extremely glad to welcome a man into their midst who would help in the work in which they were engaged. It was a very great satisfaction to them to know that he came with such a good record behind him. Mr. Betham had not gone through the usual College course, but through a practical training which he was sure would be most valuable in the work of the ministry. There was hard work to be done, but he was full of energy, and he would have the support of an earnest and united congregation. In the life of the church there must be congregational activity of various kinds. It was good that each member of the congregation should take some part and share in the work of the church. One did not fulfil one's duties as a church member by merely attending service. They were to be helpers of each other, encouragers of each other's efforts, bound together by ties of sympathy, of common convictions, and spiritual affections. They were to be, in fact, a body, an organism, all the parts of which were joined together. No doubt Mr. Betham would be able to bring these truths home to them more efficiently than he could, and he trusted that under Mr. Betham's ministry that place would prove a building where little children would learn and hear of heavenly things, where men and women would be strengthened for the work and burdens of life, and where the aged would be comforted with the knowledge of the life beyond.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER then delivered an impressive address on the Ideal of the Ministry and methods of work, offering to Mr. Betham in conclusion the right hand of fellowship on his entry into the ministry.

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS said he came there as a Unitarian layman to say a word about Mr. Betham. He had known Mr. Betham longer than anyone in the room, and he was able to say that he not only knew, but respected and believed in him. Mr. Betham had done good honest work as a layman, and now he was anxious to devote himself to the ministry. Dr. Odgers then spoke eloquently of the privileges and opportunities of their position of freedom as Unitarians.

The Rev. ERNEST BETHAM briefly returned thanks for the welcome extended to him, and expressed his deep sense of the responsibility attached to the position of minister of that church. They had a glorious opportunity to work for religion, and he was reminded of the fine old saying of the monks, "To work is worship."

The meeting was concluded with the Benediction.

BIRKENHEAD NEW SCHOOLS AND CHURCH HALL.

ON Friday evening, Jan. 5, the new schools and church hall, built by the congregation, which has hitherto worshipped in the Charing-cross Unitarian Church, were opened by Sir JOHN T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P.

The new buildings are erected on a spacious plot of ground adjoining Bessborough-road, Oxton, sufficient land having been left between the schools and the road for a new church to be erected. The building consists of a central hall with four class rooms, and is so arranged that the whole may be converted into one room by means of glazed folding doors. Accommodation is afforded for 500. A library, kitchen, and other apartments have been provided, and on the first floor there is a commodious ladies' parlour. The building is lighted and heated on thoroughly modern principles, Mr. Richard Allen, of Birkenhead, being the contractor, and Mr. T. W. Cubbon, of Birkenhead and Manchester, the architect.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER presided, and there was a representative gathering of members of the congregation and other friends from Liverpool.

The CHAIRMAN congratulated the members of the congregation in that they had made up their minds to set their house in order by providing that new building, and he trusted the work to be carried on in it would be as good as the building; and that the building might be an incentive to more earnest, more zealous, and more enthusiastic work in the future. Those who had had to do with the education of the young—and Sunday-school work formed a part of such education—had made up their minds that a good building had an extremely fine educational effect upon the students. The fact that they had turned out on a winter's night to attend that ceremony showed that there was a good deal of zeal amongst them, and he hoped it was an augury of a continuance of the zeal that had prompted them to come there that evening. Speaking further of the characteristics of Unitarians, he said that their young people were apt to get on in the world because they were trained in that freedom from prejudice, that courage, and especially that faithfulness to duty, which were qualities needful for success in life. Some people said that if money was plentiful amongst the Unitarians zeal was lacking, but that meeting showed no sign of any such defect. He then formally declared the building open.

The Rev. W. J. JUPP, of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, then gave an interesting address on "The Aims of a Unitarian Church," and was followed by Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who congratulated the congregation on a beautiful schoolroom, and emphasised the extreme importance of efficient teaching of religion, whether in Sunday-schools or by the trained ministers of religion as occasion offered through the week. He also strongly urged the congregation to build as beautiful a church as they could, for he was more and more convinced of the uplifting power of a really beautiful church building.

Addresses were also given by the Revs. H. W. Hawkes, of Bootle, J. E. Stronge, of Kilburn, a former minister at Charing-cross, a vote of thanks to chairman and speakers being unanimously accorded on the motion of the Rev. J. Crossley, seconded by Mr. A. W. Wilmer.

The building is to cost about £2,900, of which about £1,200 has been already raised. This includes the cost of the land, the greater part of which will be required for the new church, and the cost of that portion will be paid for out of the proceeds of the site at Charing-cross, recently sold.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ainsworth.—The annual congregational party was held on Tuesday, Jan. 2, and was very successful, the schoolroom being crowded. The Rev. M. R. Scott presided after tea, and in a short speech gave a hearty welcome to all, after which the drama, The Colleen Bawn, was given, the characters being sustained by members of the Sunday-school. On Saturday the scholars' party was held, and was well attended. The Rev. M. R. Scott again presided, a good programme of songs, recitations, action songs, and the operetta, Nursery Rhymes, was gone through by the younger scholars.

Banbury.—On Tuesday and Wednesday, afternoon and evening, Jan. 2 and 3, the Sunday-school parties were held at Christchurch Chapel, Horse Fair. On Tuesday evening at the usual entertainment, under the presidency of the minister (the Rev. H. Hill), a programme of recitations, &c., and a dialogue, A Tangled Web, from Young Days, was gone through. At the close Mr. and Mrs. Hill gave out to the scholars Mrs. Cobb's gifts of clothing which she had sent for them. Hearty cheers and good wishes for the New Year were given at the close for Mrs. Cobb for her great kindness. On the following day the scholars, parents, and friends had their usual tea, the evening being spent in recreation and games, &c.

Belfast: Domestic Mission.—A pleasant and progressive year has just drawn to a close, under the able guidance of Mr. G. J. Slipper, who has just completed his first year's service as missionary. On Thursday, Dec. 28, the annual congregational soirée took place. The programme consisted of songs, &c., not the least interesting part being the distribution of prizes to the members of the Sunday-school for good attendance. The children gave an excellent rendering of the cantata, "The White Garland," under the skilful guidance of Mrs. Slipper; the Rev. D. Walmsley, B.A., acted as chairman. On Sunday, Dec. 31, a watch-night service was held with an attendance of about forty, which is undoubtedly an improvement on former years. On Monday, Jan. 1, the Young Men's Social Club commenced their second quarter with a social meeting, at which the members of the Young Women's Guild attended by invitation. A most enjoyable evening was spent by all.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Domestic Mission.—The special Christmas and New Year philanthropies held in connection with this mission commenced on Friday, Dec. 22 last, and concluded on Friday, 5th inst. They included a distribution of home comforts among the deserving poor, the supply of clothing to destitute children, special assistance to military veterans and wives and families of reservists. A breakfast and Christmas gift to poor children, a dinner and New Year's gift for poor aged men and women, supper to distressed military veterans, &c., some additional measure of comfort being thus bestowed on not fewer than between 1,500 and 1,600 separate individuals. A considerable addition to the ordinary labours of the mission has recently been made, owing to its having been selected as the centre for distributing the Birmingham Daily Mail Reservist Fund in the Central Parliamentary Division, of which fund Mr. Cecil Crosskey is acting as one of the hon. secretaries. Separate social gatherings and entertainments have also been held for the Sunday morning adult class, the junior scholars, the teachers, the P.S.A., the evening congregation, the Band of Hope, &c., all of them alike being well attended and entirely successful. Special Christmas and New Year services were also held on Sundays Dec. 24 and the 31st, conducted by Mr. W. J. Clarke, morning, afternoon, and evening.

Bradford: Manchester.—On Saturday, Jan. 6, the annual scholars' party and prize distribution was held in the Public Hall, Ashton New-road. The room was packed with scholars, parents, and friends. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. Talbot. A number of scholars had not missed a single attendance during the year. On behalf of Mrs. Talbot, Mr. Talbot said it was with pleasure that the invitation was accepted to distribute the prizes, and he expressed their appreciation of the plays which had been given by the children and elder scholars. Selections of music were rendered at intervals by Mr. F. Whittaker's orchestra, and the evening throughout was exceedingly pleasant and enjoyable.

Clifton.—A soirée was held on Jan. 5 at the Hannah More Hall, Park-street, in celebration of the first anniversary of the settlement of the Rev. Dr. Warschauer at Oakfield-road Church. Mr. Charles Thomas, J.P., the treasurer of the church, referred to the motive of the gathering, and having remarked that Dr. Warschauer was doing good work for them at Oakfield-road Church, urged the congregation to do their part. They could all join in wishing Dr. and Mrs. Warschauer continued and increased success. Dr. Warschauer thanked Mr. Thomas for the sentiments he had expressed, and those present for endorsing those sentiments. It was a year since he had the honour of commencing his ministry at Oakfield-road, and he might say it had been Mrs. Warschauer's and his endeavour to throw themselves into the work with as much heartiness as possible, and it made them both happy to think that a small measure of success had attended their efforts. He had already become very much attached to Oakfield-road Church, and he hoped that during the opening year he should become even more deeply attached to the members of the congregation. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford remarked that, with a long experience of the work in Bristol, he wished to add his tribute of encouragement to Dr. and Mrs. Warschauer. If he were to tell them of the kindness, trust, counsel, and support he had received from the Unitarians of their ancient city, he could not hope to confine himself to the short speech which was the rule of the evening. He could, however, assure Dr. Warschauer of the heartiness and of the constancy of friendship with which the Unitarians of Bristol supported their ministers. They did not wear their hearts upon their sleeves, but their feelings were very strong, deep, and lasting, and he felt sure that the longer Dr. and Mrs. Warschauer stayed the better opinion they would form of the earnestness and kind heartedness of the people. With all his heart he gave to him and the Oakfield congregation his earnest wishes and god-speed. The Revs. Joseph Wain and A. Lancaster, the former and present ministers of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, also spoke, and the meeting was brought to a close with games and the singing of the National Anthem.

Croft (Resignation).—At the close of the afternoon service last Sunday, the Rev. W. Mason announced to the congregation his intention of vacating the pulpit on the last Sunday of June next. He will then have occupied it for eleven and a-half years.

Doncaster.—An Industrial and Art Exhibition, in connection with the Sunday-school and Band of Hope, was opened in the Dolphin Chambers, a spacious room most kindly lent for the purpose by Mr. S. Edgar, J.P. The exhibition remained open for three evenings, and was in every way a success. Many friends, both in the town and congregation, kindly sent loans in various departments of art, of natural history, geology, &c. Among the many interesting exhibits was the old Communion Cup, lately recovered by the congregation, and now seen by most of them for the first time. It has belonged to the chapel almost since the foundation of the society, and may have been bequeathed to it, as it apparently dates from about 1640. The industrial side of the exhibition was seen in the competitive work of the scholars. Prizes had been offered for the boy or girl who succeeded best in various branches in drawing, writing, composition, needlework, bread-making, reciting, singing, &c. Some very creditable work was shown in these departments. The competition for recitations and songs was held on the last evening, after which Miss Kaye distributed the prizes—those won in connection with the exhibition, also those gained during the year in the Sunday school, together with the Band of Hope medals. Special entertainments were given each evening. On Tuesday, in addition to music, there was a dramatic sketch. On Wednesday a series of tableaux vivants from old fairy stories.

Dukinfield.—The annual congregational soirée was held last Tuesday. Nearly three hundred sat down to tea. Alderman James Kerfoot, chapel-warden, took the chair, and in addition to the minister's annual address, very earnest and stimulating speeches were delivered by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., of Gee Cross, and the Rev. C. E. Oliver, B.A., of Denton. The accustomed annual old folks' party was given last Saturday by the congregation to the aged people of the township. The Rev. H. S. Tayler took the chair, and delivered a short address. The number of guests was greater than in any previous year. There were 432 aged people, the oldest present (Mrs. Boyer) being 91, the youngest was 60 on the day of the party; the average age was 69·5. Twenty-four guests were 80 and upwards, and 330 of them were 65 and upwards. The Sunday-school teachers waited on their guests at tea and dessert. The scholars acted, and the Old Chapel choir sang. Everybody did their best to cheer and brighten those under the burden of old age. Those guests unable to walk were sent home in cabs.]

Hale.—On Sunday last collections were taken at morning and evening service on behalf of the "Widows' and Children's" Fund, and £9 13s. 1d. was collected.

Kingswood Chapel, Hollywood, near Birmingham.—On Tuesday, Jan. 2, the children of the Sunday-school had their usual New Year's party. A substantial dinner of roast beef and plum-pudding was the first item, after which a few games in the open were indulged in. After the return to the schoolroom a number of the children contributed to the afternoon's enjoyment by an entertainment of recitations, songs and carols. Numerous presents were then distributed, and the whole entertainment was greatly enjoyed.

London: Hackney.—The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor appealed last Sunday for subscriptions on behalf of the sick and wounded in South Africa, and the congregation has contributed up to the present £17 12s. 5d., which will be paid over to the Lord Mayor's Fund.

London: Stepney Green.—Last Sunday, at 5 o'clock, the usual monthly conference in connection with the Central Postal Mission was held at College Chapel. Mr. Tavener occupied the chair, and the conference was introduced by an address by Miss L. Wilson, of Oxford, who explained the aims and methods of the new educational movement known as Ruskin Hall. The discussion was taken up with some spirit, and the movement appeared to be one which supplied a long-felt want.

Rochdale.—The Christmas and New Year gatherings have been uniformly successful. The chief event—the sale of work—realised an average amount of £131 6s. The church and school are making a joint effort in the early summer to clear off debts of £400, and to provide the nucleus of a further sum of £1,000 for alterations and extensions which are urgently needed. An appeal is made to friends in the churches. The British and Foreign Association have forwarded £25, and Messrs. Robert Taylor Heape and Richard Heape have subscribed £100 and £50 respectively. Since the amalgamation of the Rochdale congregations some £4,000 have been spent upon the church and school. No outside assistance, with the exception of a sum of £70, has been received for twenty years, and the congregation hope this fact may assist them in their present effort. Subscriptions may be sent to the Rev. T. P. Spedding, 129, Edmund-street W., Rochdale.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—On Tuesday evening, the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., gave a most interesting lecture to the Literary Society, on "A Good Puritan Woman," giving an account of the life of Mrs. Timothy Jollie, wife of the Rev. T. Jollie, first minister of Upper Chapel, and herself the daughter of an ejected minister. The lecture arose out of Mr. Manning's researches in connection with his forthcoming history of Upper Chapel, of which the bi-centenary is to be celebrated this year. The lecture presented a vivid picture of the early days of Nonconformity, and augurs well for the interest and value of Mr. Manning's book.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—The following Christmas and New Year festivities were held in connection with the Upperthorpe Chapel and Sunday-school:—Dec. 26, Social Union Soirée.—Programme: Vocal and instrumental music and dancing. Dec. 28.—Scholars' annual Christmas treat and prize distribution; thirty-six book prizes were awarded for regular attendance, and eight special prizes were given for unbroken records during the year. Each scholar on the registers received a small gift from the Christmas tree. Groups of children performed, in a very pleasing manner, the play Dick Whittington, and a cantata, "Fairy Queen's Christmas Court." Jan. 1, 1900.—Reunion meeting of teachers and elder scholars, past and present. Programme: Music and games. Jan. 3.—Old people's tea: Tea was provided for 150 aged people, as has been the custom at Upperthorpe now for many years, and each person received a packet of tea on leaving the meeting. The children repeated their play and cantata on this occasion. There were also several songs. The Revs. T. W. Holmes (Congregationalist), J. E. Manning, and John Ellis delivered appropriate addresses. During November and December the Rev. John Ellis delivered a series of addresses to young people on "The Principles and Truths of Unitarianism," with a view to inducing them to decide for the religious life, and to enter into close fellowship with the church. On Sunday last twenty young men and women took part in a service of self-consecration, prepared by Mr. Ellis, and thereupon took upon themselves the obligations of church membership. The service was appropriately closed with the administration of the Lord's Supper. This act of dedication is one of the first fruits of the Young People's Religious Union.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Thursday, Dec. 27, the scholars' annual tea and entertainment was held. The Rev. W. H. Lambelle and Mr. James Smith,

J.P. (Middlesbrough), addressed the scholars, and the prizes for good attendance were presented by Mrs. Lambelle. The monthly social evening took place on Thursday, Jan. 4.

Trebanos: S. Wales.—On Christmas Day the children had a Christmas tree, when about eighty articles were given away, and oranges were distributed at the close. A miscellaneous concert was afterwards given, and young men and women from the congregation took part by reciting, singing, and performing dialogues. The large room was crowded, about 700 being present. On Boxing Day the band captured three prizes—one at Morriston and two at Llanelly. The Sunday-school is very flourishing, and at the end of this year it has been resolved to give prizes for attendance. The week-night meetings, prayer meeting, Bible class, and Band of Hope, are fairly well attended. Last Sunday, 7th inst., our minister, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, extended the right hand of fellowship to five new members, three of whom were coming over from different orthodox denominations.

Yarmouth (Appointment).—The Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of the Old Meeting.

We live too much in the outward; in driving toil without spiritual renewal. We need to learn the wisdom of reinforcing the inner vitality by nourishing the roots on faith and principle. Our souls need rest; that, in secret, prayer and Divine communion shall nourish the inner life of the spirit.—R. R. Shippen.

ST. NICHOLAS OLD MEETING, IPSWICH.

This Unitarian Chapel will be 200 years old this year. It is proposed to celebrate the Bi-centenary by executing the structural and other repairs necessary for its preservation. It is also proposed, if the requisite funds can be procured, to effect certain sorely needed improvements, in particular to supply heating apparatus, to make the seating in some respects more comfortable, and, if possible, to renew the organ. The estimated cost of the works thus contemplated is £1,500. The Committee, in renewing their appeal for aid, have most gratefully to acknowledge the generosity of those who have already so promptly responded with donations or promises, and they feel encouraged to earnestly hope that other friends will respond in like manner, and so enable the work to be carried out.

The congregation has averaged of late about 50 in the morning, 100 in the evening. Ipswich is a thriving and increasing town, and, judging from what has lately been accomplished, there does appear reason to hope, that with the assistance now sought, the progress which has been apparent will continue, and good work be thus done for the Unitarian cause in the district.

Since the appeal was first issued the Committee have been favoured with valuable counsel from the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings (based upon the report of their Secretary, Thackeray Turner, Esq, whom they deputed to inspect the chapel) as to the best method of carrying out the work with a special object of preserving the true character of an old historic building.

C. J. NOTCUTT, Chairman.
R. HAMBLIN, Hon. Treasurer.

Donations or promises may be sent to F. H. SMITH, Hon. Sec., 32, Warwick-road; ROBERT HAMBLIN, 19, Gippeswyk-road; or W. J. SCOPES, Queen-street, Ipswich.

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

DR. MARTINEAU'S PUBLICATIONS.

WITH no words of faithless mourning, but touched by the calmness of that ultimate peace, which now rests upon him, we record the passing from us of our revered and beloved Teacher, Dr. James Martineau. With reverent thankfulness we must think of his completed life, rich far beyond the measure of accustomed years, and yet more in gifts of the spirit, in prophetic power, in eminent services rendered to his own religious community and to the world, in laborious work wonderfully sustained and brought to a beautiful completion.

When he was eighty years of age, Dr. Martineau began to publish his great philosophical works, the substance of which had been the constant occupation of his thoughts for more than fifty years; and the marvel was that up to the very last he had been perfecting the work, keeping abreast of the latest thought on his subjects, not as one whose task was long since finished and had merely to be given to the world, but as a teacher with all the splendour of his gifts undimned, as a master mind, speaking not to the past, but to the present, words of living power. Close upon the "Types of Ethical Theory" and the "Study of Religion" followed the "Seat of Authority in Religion," which gathered up the fruits of his life-long study of the New Testament and the types of religious life in the Christian Church, and presented his ideal of Christian discipleship, a masterly work published fifty-four years after the appearance of his "Rationale of Religious Enquiry." At the same time he brought out four volumes of collected "Essays, Reviews, and Addresses," ranging from one of his earliest essays, on Dr. Priestley, which first appeared in the Monthly Repository in 1833, to his essays on "A Way Out of the Trinitarian Controversy," which appeared in the Christian Reformer in 1886, and on "The National Church as a Federal Union," which was separately published, the last of several efforts made in furtherance of his lofty ideal of religious fellowship.

The volume of "Home Prayers" published in 1891, Dr. Martineau spoke of in the Preface as the last which he should offer to his contemporaries, and indeed it has been seldom given to any writer so to complete his life work; yet still he responded with unfailing generosity to calls upon his sympathy. When he was ninety years of age he wrote a memorial preface of more than twenty pages for the posthumous volume of sermons, "A Spiritual Faith," by his friend the late Rev. John Hamilton Thom; in 1897 four of his sermons were published as one of Messrs. James Clarke and Co.'s "Small Books on Great Subjects" under the title "Faith the Beginning, Self-surrender the Fulfilment, of the Spiritual Life," and to the New Year's number of THE INQUIRER in 1898 he contributed a sermon on "The Constancy of Nature and the Faithfulness of God."

So the inward light continued to burn, even while the infirmities of extreme old age inevitably crept upon him; and in his home, sustained by his daughters' tender care, his grasp was gently loosened from all mortal things. The wonderful smile of greeting to his friends never failed, nor the affectionate grasp of his hand. Only two days before he passed away, among his last words of full conscious recognition, was an expression of the happy sense he had, from the portraits in his room of Mr. Thom, John James Tayler, Dean Stanley, and others, of being surrounded by his friends. So there came to him the last quiet sleep and the benediction of Divine Peace.

In such a memorial notice as this we can only attempt briefly and simply to tell the story of a remarkable life, which has covered nearly the whole of a century, and has been fruitful of good far beyond what it is possible for us to estimate.

James Martineau was born at Norwich, April 21, 1805, younger by nearly three years than his sister Harriet, while the youngest of their family of eight was Ellen, the late Mrs. Alfred Higginson. Their father, Thomas Martineau, was a camlet manufacturer and wine merchant, a younger brother of Philip Meadows Martineau, the eminent surgeon, of a line of surgeons going back to Gaston, the Huguenot refugee, who had settled in Norwich after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685; their mother was Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Mr. Robert Rankin, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, a woman of remarkable gifts and great decision of character.

In the account of Dr. Martineau, written by the late Rev. Charles Wicksteed, in 1877, for Cassell's "National Portrait Gallery," the mother is thus described:—"Of great energy and quickness of resource, and married to a man of more tenderness and moral refinement than force of self-assertion, she naturally took (though always supported by the authority and admiration of her husband) the chief part in the government of the household; training her children in wholesome habits and clever arts, and stimulating them by her sparkling conversation." And in the Daily News of Dec. 30, 1884, Dr. Martineau himself wrote in reference to Mrs. Fenwick Miller's "Life of Harriet Martineau," which contained a disparaging representation of their mother: "It is true that her understanding was clear, and her will, with a duty once in sight, not to be diverted: but behind these, and giving them their direction, was an inexhaustible force of affection; and not behind them only, but glowing through them into her expressive features and fervent words. A slight and delicate portrait of her is before me, from the pencil of a young artist friend who had an eye to read her truly; and no one can fail to see that its calm dignity is but the momentary composure of a countenance moulded by emotion, and often tremulous with pity and with love. Of this matron who rarely wept, my sister Ellen remarked to me, 'Never did I know anyone more prone to tears at the touch of sympathy or grief,' supporting the remark by a characteristic instance which I must not stay to recite. This quickness of feeling extended, no doubt, to her temper, so far as to render her displeasure at wrong emphatic, and to warn us also, if we did not wish to be laughed at, to do nothing awkward or stupid under her eye. But it secured no less the praise of well-doing, and a bright response to whatever was generous and noble." Whatever there was unhappy in his own childhood, Dr. Martineau added, was due, so far as he remembered it, to himself, "or to the well-meant teasings of older brothers, or to the tyranny of a large public school."

The Norwich of those days was rich in stimulating influences. Bishop Bathurst had given a tone of liberalism, unusual in a cathedral city, and among the friends of the Martineaus were Dr. Samuel Parr, Dr. Alderson, Mrs. Opie, William Taylor (author of the "Historic Survey of German Poetry"), and Sir James Edward Smith, the botanists, first president of the Linnæan Society. These latter, with the Martineaus, were members of the congregation of the Octagon Chapel, which had taken the place of an earlier meeting house, and was opened in 1756, during the ministry of Dr. John Taylor. When James Martineau was born the Rev. Pendlebury Houghton was minister, but during his boyhood and early manhood, it was to the voice of the Rev. Thomas Madge that he listened at the Octagon. When the centenary of the old chapel was celebrated on Sunday, May 11, 1856, Madge and Martineau were the two preachers for the day.

As a boy of ten, James was sent to the Norwich Grammar-school, in the Cathedral Close, under Edward Valpy as head-master, a younger brother of Dr. Richard Valpy, author of the Greek and Latin grammars. There the shy and sensitive lad suffered a good deal from rough treatment, but laid the foundations of a sound classical training. Among his school-fellows were James Brooke, afterwards Rajah of Sarawak, George Borrow (author of "The Bible in Spain,") and John Dalrymple. Great was the change when, at fourteen, he went for two years to Dr. Lant Carpenter's school at Bristol. There, it would seem, he received the first strong religious impressions of his life, under the influence of a teacher of very earnest and fervent piety and great strenuousness of character, and he always spoke with veneration and gratitude of Dr. Carpenter. How strong was his feeling may be seen in the reminiscences which Dr. Martineau subsequently contributed to the biography of that venerable man and of his daughter, Mary Carpenter. "So forcibly," he wrote, "did that period act upon me—so visibly did it determine the subsequent direction of my mind and lot, that it always stands before me as the commencement of my present life, making me feel like a man without a childhood."

In 1821, being destined for the career of a civil engineer, Martineau entered the machine works of a Mr. Fox at Derby, finding a home in the family of the Rev. Edward Higginson, minister of the Friar-gate Chapel. With a great liking for mathematics and natural science, he was disappointed to find how narrow the range of his occupations, which were purely mechanical, and how little of true education on the intellectual side of his profession he was likely to receive during the five years for which he was bound. At Bristol his deeper nature had been already stirred, and in the year following his settlement at Derby occurred what he many years afterwards spoke of as his "conversion."

His cousin Catharine Rankin, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, had recently married the Rev. Henry Turner, assistant minister at the High Pavement Chapel, in the neighbouring town of Nottingham; but the promise of their happy married life and of his ministry was cut off by his early death, and it was then, in 1822, that Martineau, seeing as he stood by the grave tokens of such profound sorrow and reverent affection and the evident marks of spiritual influence exerted by the young minister who was dead, was swept away by a new and resistless impulse and determined to consecrate himself to the Christian ministry.*

College and Early Ministry.

Thus, in his eighteenth year, James Martineau was entered as a divinity student at Manchester College, then at York, under the care of the Revs. Charles Wellbeloved and John Kenrick, and entered upon that close association with the College, which was to be continued throughout his life, with little interruption of actual participation in its work, and none in his whole-hearted loyalty to its great principle of Free Teaching and Free Learning in Theology. Among his fellow-students were John Relly Beard, Edward Tagart, Franklin Howorth, Robert Brooke Aspland (who was in his own year), William Gaskell, and Samuel Bache. On leaving College in 1827, he spent a year as assistant to Dr. Lant Carpenter in his school at Bristol, but in the autumn of 1828 removed to Dublin, to enter on his first ministerial charge.

In that city there were two important Presbyterian congregations, which with other non-subscribing societies in Ireland had become Unitarian in their theology. At Strand-street the Rev. William Hamilton Drummond, father of the present Principal of Manchester College, was one of the ministers; at Eustace-street the Revs. Philip Taylor, a cousin of the Martineaus, and Joseph Hutton, grandfather of the late R. H. Hutton, were in charge, and it was as assistant and successor to his aged relative that James Martineau went to Dublin. He was ordained on Sunday, Oct. 26, 1828, after the Presbyterian manner, with the laying on of hands, and the ordination service was published. In his address the young minister declared what he conceived to be the duties of his office as "the servant of Revelation, appointed to expound its doctrines, to enforce its precepts, and to proclaim its sanctions." "As all religion begins," he said, "so also does it end, with exhibiting the relation which man bears to his Creator."

"As I believe Him to be the only scriptural object of worship, so do I conceive the affections implied in that worship to be the greatest glory of the human soul, and to be absolutely essential to the acceptable discharge of duty here, and to participation in the felicities of heaven hereafter. I am conscious of nothing but sincerity in saying, that to inspire in others and in myself a devotion ever fervent and humble, which shall have a bearing on every duty, purify every thought, and tranquilise every grief, I desire to make the main object not only of my ministry, but of my life."

Having then spoken of the special revelation of God in Jesus Christ, "the Mediator between God and man," who is to come hereafter to judge the world in righteousness, and who is to be obeyed as the authoritative teacher of everlasting truth, he proceeded to describe the responsibility laid upon a minister, to gain and to impart knowledge, and to apply it to the critical study of the Bible.

"I think it obligatory upon him not to hide the light that is in him, but to impart to his people, and more especially to the young, the knowledge which he may acquire, and the conclusions to which his investigations conduct him; that they may read the volume of Holy Writ with increased interest and intelligence, and that their minds may be opened to enlarged views of Christian truth. In these inquiries and instructions he requires, and can receive, no aid from the authority of any man or any Church. His most valuable guides are his own mind and his own conscience; and his most valuable privilege in the use of these is his unquestionable right of private judgment. Whether he study or whether he teach, let him stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made him free."

To that ideal of service, so earnestly declared, Martineau was true to the end, ever a teacher, ever a learner, with strenuous faithfulness, and kindling in others the ardour of his passion for truth. His duties as minister were not at first severe, and, on his marriage in the December following his ordination, to Helen, the eldest child of the Rev. Edward Higginson, of Derby, he took a few pupils into his house, some of whom were already entered at Trinity College, and at once threw himself energetically into the work of teaching.

In March, 1830, he took part in the formation at Dublin of the Irish Unitarian Christian Society, acting as secretary and moving a resolution affirming the vital importance of free inquiry, out of which their Unitarianism had grown. In July he preached at Cork before the Southern Presbyterian Association of Ireland the sermon on "Peace in Division; or, the Duties of Christians in an Age of Controversy," which was, so far as we are aware, except for the ordination address, his first publication. In the following year he edited a hymn-book for his congregation, "A Collection of Hymns for Christian Worship," which already foreshadowed the excellence of his later books. The preface pleaded for liberty of wider selection than had been customary, in order to secure real devotional and poetical excellence, and acknowledged the services of Bishop Heber in liberalising the character of the poetry designed for use in the churches. Martineau's Irish career was, however, destined to be of only short duration. The cause of its termination is thus described in the memoir from which we have already quoted:

"In Dublin he found himself in the midst of a highly-charged and sensitive atmosphere, both theological and political. In addition to several trials to his larger and freer spirit, on the death of his senior colleague, the Rev. Philip Taylor, the regium donum—an annual allowance to the Presbyterian ministers from the Crown, which had been made uninterruptedly from the year 1690—necessarily fell to him. Whether the theoretical objections to any organic connection between Church and State would alone have decided him in reference to this matter, we doubt; but four years' residence in Ireland had brought before him so strongly the gross injustice involved in the relative position of the Catholic Church and the two chief Protestant bodies, that the very idea of being personally participant in it affected him with shame; and though quite willing himself to sacrifice the additional means (about £100), if it would have solved the difficulty, he could hardly expect his congregation to deprive themselves and their future ministers of it; and this they very decidedly and rather abruptly made him aware they were not disposed to do."

Thus in 1832 his ministry at Eustace-street came to an end, and his pupils were given up. No other settlement among the Irish Presbyterians was possible to him, but happily a way speedily opened in his own country. He was not unknown in Lancashire, for at a meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association held in Manchester in June, 1830, he had been present, and spoke for the newly-formed Irish Society, of which he was secretary, and the authorities of Manchester College were, of course, fully aware of his brilliant gifts.

Ministry in Liverpool.

How the call to Liverpool came to Mr. Martineau we will tell in the words of the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, who in 1832 was minister of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth:—

"The English Presbyterians—now long distinguished by the more familiar name of Unitarians—the spirit of whose leading laity was always on the side of worthy and conscientious struggles for freedom of thought, immediately set their eye upon him. The Rev. John Grundy, minister of Paradise-street Chapel, in Liverpool, requiring a colleague, the wealthy merchants constituting the chief part of his congregation united with him in the desire to secure the services of the young and brilliant minister, and thus offer him at once the tribute of their honour and confidence, and an open field of thought and speech. Well does the writer remember (1877), though it is forty-five years ago, how the circular staircase of the somewhat conspicuous pulpit was quietly ascended by a tall young man, thin, but of vigorous and muscular frame, with dark hair, pale, but not delicate complexion, a countenance full in repose of thought, and in animation of intelligence and enthusiasm, features belonging to no regular type or order of beauty, and yet leaving the impression of a very high kind of beauty, and a voice so sweet, and clear, and strong, without being in the least degree loud, that it conveyed all the inspiration of music without any of its art or intention. When this young man, with the background of his honour and courage, rose to speak of the inspiration that was not in the letter but in the soul, and (for that time of day) boldly distinguished between the inspiration of Old Testament books and Old Testament heroes, he completed the conquest of his hearers."

For twenty-five years Martineau exercised in Liverpool a ministry of growing power. Three years after his settlement the Rev. John Grundy resigned, and he was left in sole charge of the Paradise-street congregation, while he had as close friend and brother John Hamilton Thom, minister of Renshaw-street Chapel, and in Manchester, at Mosley-street and afterwards at Upper Brook-street, a kindred spirit and elder brother, John James Tayler. The conjunction of these three men in close spiritual sympathy and common work, with whom was associated Charles Wicksteed, who in 1835 removed from Liverpool to Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, marked a new era in the religious life of the churches they so faithfully served.

Martineau was born in the year following Dr. Priestley's death, and his early nurture was in a religious atmosphere largely dominated by the philosophy and theology of that distinguished man. But then came the fresh influence of Channing from across the Atlantic, bringing to many in this country as in his own a new spiritual birth. He, as Mr. Thom once said, "first touched the spring of living water, and made me independent even of himself"; and so also Martineau spoke of "Channing, inspirer of my youth." He led those young men fully to realise what was meant by freedom of the spirit, and religion of the inward life, in which reason and conscience have ultimate authority as witnesses to the Divine, and the human soul is called to direct personal communion with God. The foundations of Christian truth, they felt, must not be sought in external testimony, and must not be left to any proof from miracles, they were in the soul itself, in the "self-evidencing power of spiritual truth," in the inward witness to the reality of that filial relation between the soul and God, so perfectly revealed in Jesus Christ.

It is true that in his first book, the "Rationale of Religious Enquiry," published in 1836, Martineau affirmed that no one could rightly be called a Christian who did not accept as historical the miraculous narratives of the Gospels, but he was already quite clear that miracle as such could not prove spiritual truth, and that all the contents of the Gospel teaching must be brought to the test of inward verification. Thus he was regarded by the older Unitarians, who held to a more external system of Christian evidences, as a dangerous heretic, and the history of those twenty-five years is under one aspect the history of the growing influence of the spiritual teaching of Tayler, Martineau, and Thom, in the face of serious distrust and frequent opposition, until the transcendent power and the winning graces of these men finally prevailed. The battle was fought in the churches and in Manchester College, and looking back long afterwards on those trying times, Mr. Thom declared: "There are now no two parties amongst us. There are no two sections, looking jealously, suspiciously, and distrustfully at one another—and I think Manchester New College has reason to be proud that mainly owing to the influence of its two latest Principals, of John James Tayler, and his congenial successor, Dr. Martineau, our Church, in all essential matters, is now a Church of the Spirit." Of the College we shall have presently to speak, in which, in 1840, Tayler and Martineau became associated as teachers; but it was no less in their ministry and in their writings that that potent influence was exerted.

Liverpool, when Martineau began to preach there was a stronghold of the extreme Evangelical party in the Church, and how quickly and profoundly his power and Mr. Thom's made itself felt was shown by the onslaught in 1839 of thirteen clergymen of the Church upon the Unitarians and their teaching. There were only three Unitarians ministers to stand the brunt of this attack, but they were more than equal to the task. Martineau gave five of the lectures, which we have noted in the list of his publications. That on "Christianity without Priest and without Ritual," and Mr. Thom's on "Christianity not the property of Critics and Scholars, but the gift of God to all men," and on "The Comforter, even the Spirit of Truth, who dwelleth in us, and teacheth all things," were specially significant of the new movement of religious life, of which they were the leaders. Dr. Channing, in the year following the controversy, wrote to Harriet Martineau: "You speak of your brother James. Since writing to you I have read all his lectures, and they seem to me among the noblest efforts of our times. They have quickened and instructed me. Indeed, his lectures and Mr. Thom's give me new hope for the cause of truth in England. Not that I expect any great immediate effect; but noble spiritual action in a few is an augury of good which cannot fail."

That "noble spiritual action" found for itself a wider scope, when in 1843 Martineau published the first volume of his "Endeavours after the Christian Life," and again in 1847 a second series. These sermons of practical religion carried his influence far beyond the circle of his own community, and brought to him, as he acknowledges, in the Preface to the second series, "delightful and unsought-for intercourse with persons, whom it is an honour to know, of various religious denominations." How much we owe to these sermons is vividly recalled by the mere repetition of some of their titles: "The Besetting God," "The Contentment of Sorrow," "The Strength of the Lonely," "Christ and the Little Child," "The Christianity of Old Age," "Nothing Human Ever Dies," "Great Hopes for Great Souls," "The Unclouded Heart," "The Free-man of Christ," "Looking Up and Lifting Up," "The Christian Time View," "The Family in Heaven and Earth." Such were the sermons preached to the congregation in Paradise-street, and as an instance of practical dealing with a question of the day may be cited the sermon on "Ireland and her Famine," preached in 1847, after which the congregation contributed £500 in the collection. (The sermon is reprinted in the fourth volume of collected Essays, &c., 1891.)

Throughout those years Martineau's influence was making itself felt not only as a preacher, but as a powerful writer in the Reviews. In 1839 Mr. Thom undertook to edit a new series of the Christian Teacher, which in 1845 was enlarged into the Prospective Review, a quarterly which was edited by the four friends—Tayler, Martineau, Thom and Wicksteed.

"Mr. Thom," wrote Dr. Martineau in 1895, looking back upon those days, "having his hands most free, was executive editor; but the contents of the successive numbers were blocked out at cabinet councils held at one of our Liverpool or Manchester houses. We dined and spent the evening together, often remaining till next day. And in the wide landscape of the past that lies before me in this evening of my life there are few spots picked out by brighter glow than those hours of loving and animated converse. We were different enough in modes and material of thought to stimulate each other, yet so congenial as to be drawn nearer by the polarity. To see Mr. Tayler's richly stored, reverent, and delicate mind set free as a child at play was in itself an object-lesson in wisdom and beauty. Mr. Thom's habitual inner life among high ideals, and consequent quick detection of imposture and inanity in the actual, could find its grave expression, from the pulpit or the platform, in severe rebuke; but when only friends were present and offenders away, in a vein of picturesque humour, so refreshing that, even if the victim were there, he would feel like a patient under treatment who, with bitter expectations, found himself let off with a pleasant effervescent draught. The other two partners had the delightful privilege of enjoying the feast of soul, bringing to it only a homely contribution of common sense and some knowledge of affairs."

What the "homely contribution" of one of those other two must have been, the extreme modesty of the above allusion cannot prevent one from imagining.

The Prospective and the National which followed it, from 1855 to 1864, edited by Martineau and Richard Hutton, were enriched by contributions not only from the editors, but from such men as Walter Bagehot, William Caldwell Roscoe, and William Rathbone Greg, and became one of the most potent educational forces of the day, making for liberal religion, and a noble literary culture. Many of the most striking of Martineau's essays, philosophical and theological, historical and ecclesiastical, appeared first in these reviews—such essays as that on "Personal Influences on Present Theology: J. H. Newman, S. T. Coleridge, T. Carlyle," on "Thomas Arnold: Life and Correspondence," "Lessing: Theology and Times," "Schleiermacher: Life and Times," the reviews of Whewell, Hamilton, Mill, and Bain; the essay on "Early History of Messianic Ideas," on "Church and State," and on "Europe since the Reformation." These are now gathered up into the four volumes of "Essays, Reviews, and Addresses," together with others contributed to the Westminster and other Reviews.

It was in the Prospective Review of 1851 that the article on "Mesmeric Atheism" appeared, in which Martineau dealt very severely with Atkinson, the joint author with his sister Harriet of the "Letters on Man's Nature." Of the painful alienation of sister from brother which followed Dr. Martineau wrote in 1884:—

"I was not conscious, I am not conscious of having deserved it; nor could I ever see why the old relation of affectionate appreciation should be less maintainable than between the two brothers Newman, after one of them had submitted to the Pope, while the other had become the apostle of Theism. Great changes of thought, like these, must of course seriously narrow the immediate ground of possible sympathy; but, besides the common sincerity and loyalty to conscience, there remains the fellowship of tender memories, of joint enthusiasms, of identical friendships and of not a few admirations and duties uncontroverted still. Hence, I never reciprocated the alienation from which I suffered, and should have escaped a real sorrow, had the efforts to remove it been successful. It has simply counted for me as an instance more of my sister's liability to oscillate between extremes of devotedness and antipathy and has in no way disenchanted the old affection, or impaired my estimate of her high aims, her large powers, and her noble and patient virtues."

Professor in Manchester New College.

To the record of Martineau's work as a preacher and a writer has to be added that of his teaching. In Liverpool his children grew up (two of whom were born in Dublin), and he and his wife were their first and principal teachers. He also held classes and gave courses of lectures for the young people of his congregation, but the great work of his life as a teacher began in 1840, when he was appointed Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy and Political Economy in Manchester New College, which in that year was removed from York, where he himself had studied, and was re-established in Manchester.

During the first years of his professorship Martineau found that his whole mental attitude was undergoing a process of change. In the Preface to "Types of Ethical Theory," he described it as follows:—"When I first woke up, before and during my College life, to the interest of moral and metaphysical speculations, I carried into them, from previous training for the profession of civil engineer, a store of exclusively scientific conceptions, rendered familiar in the elementary study of mathematics, mechanics, and chemistry. Small as it was, it was my all, and necessarily dictated the only rules of judgment which I could apply. I had nothing to take with me into logical and ethical problems but the maxims and postulates of physical knowledge; and, as the instructions of the philosophical class-room, excellent of their kind, moved strictly within the same limits, I was inevitably shut up in the habit of interpreting the human phenomena by the analogy of external nature. Steeped in the empirical and necessarian mode of thought, I served out successive terms of willing captivity to Locke and Hartley, to Collins, Edwards, and Priestley, to Bentham, and James Mill; and though at times I was driven to disaffection by the dogmatism and acrid humours of the last two of these philosophers, my allegiance was restored and lengthened by literary and personal relations with the younger Mill.

It was, he said, "the irresistible pleading of the moral consciousness" which first drove him to rebel against the limits of the merely scientific conception, and to insist on finding a real meaning in such words as 'responsibility,' 'guilt,' 'merit,' 'duty'; he was forced to concede to the self-conscious mind itself, both as knowing and as willing, an autonomous function distinct from each and all the phenomena known and changes willed—a self-identity, as unlike as possible to any growing aggregate of miscellaneous and dissimilar experiences. He continued for a time to use the old text-books, "though, doubtless, with more frequent comments of dissent," and then came a break in his teaching, and an opportunity for further study, bringing with it what he describes as "a new intellectual birth."

Fifteen Months in Germany.

We must not pass from the sixteen years of Martineau's ministry in Paradise-street Chapel without at least a mention of the Liverpool Domestic Mission Society, founded in 1836, and of which the Rev. John Johns was the first minister to the poor, and in 1847 the first martyr. Dr. Tuckerman had given the first impulse to this work, by what he had done in Boston, and by the contagion of his enthusiasm, when he came on a visit to this country, and no cause was nearer the hearts of the two young ministers who were so largely instrumental in the formation of the Liverpool Society. To the end Dr. Martineau was an ardent advocate of the duty of such ministry in the homes of the neglected poor.

To the Paradise-street ministry belongs also the second of Martineau's hymn-books, published in 1840, "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home," which though at first received with disfavour in some quarters, steadily made its way, and became the book far the most widely used by Unitarian congregations in this country, until the process of time brought new treasures and certain changes of religious feeling, which made a new collection desirable, a need which was met by the issue in 1873 of Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer."

The Paradise-street congregation having determined to build a new church, Mr. Martineau preached a farewell sermon in the old chapel, July 16, 1848, and having leave of absence from College also, went abroad with his family for fifteen months. The farewell sermon "Pause and Retrospect," together with an address at the laying of the foundation-stone of the new Hope-street Church are to be found in the last volume of the collected Essays, &c. The following passage well indicates the spirit in which those years of ministry, which produced the "Endeavours after the Christian Life," were closed:—

"Nothing has been nearer to my heart than to substitute among you the Religion of Consciousness for the Religion of Custom. It is quite true, and it is a truth too plain to miss, that it is the business of religion to preside over our inner world—to rule the thoughts, to quiet the passions, to elevate the will. It is also true, and it is a truth far less understood, that the condition of that inner world itself determines our religion—that, precisely in proportion as the affections are pure and deep, the conscience clear and strong, and the imagination familiar with great and beautiful examples, are heavenly realities discerned, and the windows of Reason thrown open to the empyrean light. In the mind barren with selfishness, the very root is withered from which the blossom and the shade of holy hope must spring. To one who dishonours himself by sloth and excess, God becomes invisible and incredible. From him who quickens his business, or hurries in his talk, in order to push aside the whispers of a smaller but a truer voice, the awful form of Duty sorrowfully retires, and lets him believe that life is given to play his own game, and not to serve another's will. From such men, the very power of perception itself is absent: they look through no transparent medium, but through a glass clouded with earthly steams: so that, demonstrate as you will the realities beyond, they cannot see. Moral and emotional disorder as effectually excludes religious truth, as intellectual mania vitiates ordinary judgment; and the best schooling will teach nothing till the wounded nature is healed, and the fever of the soul abates. Both the theoretical doubts, and the practical deadness of religion will remain, I believe, untouched till they are dealt with by this rule. They are but symptoms, which it is useless directly to attack, and which can vanish only with an altered mind. Till the soul attains some loftiness, by the free and faithful activity of its best powers, faith is not really possible to it: and when it has assumed this temper, misgivings will trouble it no more. Men rise into holy truth as into a vision denied to the low level and sluggish atmosphere of a flat spirit: you must lift their feet upon the mountains, and make them feel the wing of the upland air, and pierce the cloud-belt that floats between earth and sky: and then, amid the wilderness of glories, they will discern the palace of the Infinite, and feel the silence of the Eternal.

I have also wished to elicit the moral beauty, the inherent sublimity, and the natural authority, of Christianity. Without the full feeling of these characteristics, I have feared that an appeal to the external attestation of preternatural events would produce a feeble, or even an unhappy, impression; while on the other hand, the largest amount of historical belief, when gained, can do no more than awaken this feeling, and bring us in discipleship to the feet of Christ.

If we discern the perfectness of his spirit, if we recognise it as divine, is anything wanting to the sense of its authority? And if we do not discern this, could any coercion of outward demonstration create the feeling? Nothing surely can have authority with us, save that which touches the seat of all authority—the conscience. Hence, to harmonise the teaching of Christ with the moral intuitions of the mind, to show how they raise us to a consciousness of duty and capacity unfelt before, to clear away the confused rivalry of other images, and make it apparent that, in all human history, he stands at the unapproached summit, the mingling point of the ideal and the real; this has been the purpose I have followed with the fullest heart."

The Martineaus went first to Dresden, and then settled down for the winter at Berlin; there Martineau devoted himself to the study of Plato and Hegel, and under the guidance of Professor Trendelenburg passed through "a kind of second education." What he received was essentially "the gift of fresh conceptions, the unsealing of hidden openings of self-consciousness, with unmeasured corridors and sacred halls behind; and, once gained, it was more or less available throughout the history of philosophy and lifted the darkness from the pages of Kant and even Hegel. It was impossible to resist or distrust this gradual widening of apprehension: it was as much a fact as the sight of Alps I had never visited before. I thus came into the same plight, in respect of the cognitive and æsthetic side of life, that had already befallen me in regard to the moral."

Conclusion of Liverpool Ministry.

In the autumn of 1849 Martineau returned to his congregation for the opening of the new church, and on the following Sunday morning, Oct. 21, preached the sermon on "The Watch-night Lamps," in which he declared that their religious life must be devoted to Endeavour, Humiliation, Trust, Service and Communion.

So also at the stone-laying he had said: "The structure rising from this spot is not destined to interpose between the soul and God, but to bring them into intimate and personal communion; not to provide a sacerdotal medium of approach, but to shut out the secular causes of forgetfulness and separation. We build a place, not for the high altar, but for the humble spirit; where the worship will be, not for the people, but by them; where the minister appears as a man amongst men, conscious of their frailties, their sorrows, their aspirations, and, only through his sad partnership in these, able to interpret them aright in preaching, and without pretence, acknowledge them in prayer. It is but by the sympathy of mind with mind, the attraction of like to like, that the lines of supplication from each separate and silent heart converge to the place in which he stands, and finding a representative spirit there, burst into open voice. We accept here the deposit of no man's faith, but will help him, if he can, to use the talent with a faithful trust."

For eight years that voice was to be heard in Hope-street Church. Thackeray heard it there, before sailing to America on a lecturing tour, and wrote to Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh (Rab's friend): "I heard James Martineau (the Unitarian) last Sunday, and was struck by his lofty devotional spirit." And many another visitor, passing either way across the ocean, embraced the welcome opportunity of visiting his church. But the hour of separation came at last, and at the end of twenty-five years of ministry in Liverpool. Manchester College had been removed in 1853 to London, where it was established in University Hall, Gordon-square, and for the first few years Martineau travelled regularly up to town to deliver his lectures; but the strain was too great, and a re-arrangement of the teaching staff by which he and Mr Tayler should practically share the work between them, with his son, Mr. Russell Martineau as lecturer on Hebrew, made it essential that he should remove to London.

"Gain does not tempt me," he wrote to his devoted congregation, "for I go to a poorer life; or ambition, for I retire to a less conspicuous; or ease, for I commit myself to unsparing labour. And of the unbounded freedom and confidence so nobly vouchsafed to me here, it is no secret to me that I must expect less, even though I should deserve it more. But none of these things move me from the feeling that the work proposed to me is, of all the offices of life, that which I can best fulfil; and that, in being humanly offered, it is also Providentially arranged."

Teacher and Minister in London.

Martineau came to London in 1857, not without a strong protest on the part of many prominent adherents to the older modes of Unitarian thought, who were unwilling that the teaching of religious philosophy should be given into his hands, and that he and Mr. Tayler should have the whole instruction of young ministers in their hands. But that weighty protest, signed by such men as the Revs. T. Madge, R. B. Aspland, and the heretic's own brothers-in-law, S. Bache and E. Higginson, was met by a yet stronger rally on the part of those who trusted in their chosen teachers, and the appointment was sustained. On his retirement from the College staff twenty-eight years later Dr. Martineau spoke of that trying time in acknowledging a vote of the College trustees, and referred to another meeting, which he had attended with very different feelings:—

"I well remember the trembling heart with which I attended that meeting. It was immediately after an expression of utter distrust of my teaching, and a protest against its enlarged recognition in this College, published with a host of names which I held in the sincerest respect. I remember the doubt and misgiving which oppressed me then, not only from the personal peril incurred by an unwelcomed removal from a sphere of work where I was happy, but also from the fear lest I should have really betrayed the interests of the very institution which it was in my heart to serve. In proportion to the distress of that time, is the gratitude with which I must accept the resolution just passed, and the proceedings of this week, as virtually erasing the record of the former distrust. I would not say this if I thought that any feeling survived which could be hurt by the reference; but of the bitterness of that time, the last vestige has wholly ceased. Among the names that were appended to that protest, were those of friends who have been near and dear to me since I came to London. So that is all passed. And now the fear rather is of too much approval; for true it is that there must be something wrong and unwholesome in a man who no longer finds that he is at variance with anybody."

Nine years later another vehement controversy raged over Dr. Martineau, for on the death of Dr. Hoppus, he became a candidate for the Chair of the Philosophy of Mind and Logic at University College. He was without question by far the most gifted and experienced of the candidates, but objection was taken on the ground that he was a Unitarian minister, and was not therefore to be trusted as an impartial student of philosophy, and the late Croom Robertson, then quite a young man, was appointed. In protest, the late Professor de Morgan resigned his Chair and the Council of University College was subjected to some very severe criticism.

That, however, was a passing storm, and Martineau's influence as a teacher steadily increased. In London he was in closer personal touch with the vital movements of the time, and he especially enjoyed the meetings of the Metaphysical Society, at which he met such men as Tennyson and Browning, Manning, Faber, Gladstone, and both the Newmans, Tyndall, Huxley, and many others. Both by his public lectures at College, notably that on "Religion, as affected by Modern Materialism," and by articles in the Reviews, he commanded the attention of the best minds of the age; and as a preacher he was again heard and by a wider circle than was possible in Liverpool. In 1858 he had become minister of Little Portland-street Chapel, with his friend and colleague the Rev. J. J. Tayler, and, from 1860 until his retirement in 1872, in sole charge.

What his preaching was to one of his hearers we are privileged to record in the article by Miss Frances Power

Cobbe, and the substance of it may be gathered from the two volumes of sermons, "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," published in 1876 and 1879.

It was with great regret that Dr. Martineau relinquished the office of preacher, but he had been warned that the strain was too great, and he had long felt that his duty to Manchester College was paramount. In 1872 he resigned the pulpit, when his congregation made a parting gift to him of £3,500, a number of other friends in the same year, as a mark of "gratitude, affection, respect, and admiration," having presented him with two pieces of inscribed silver plate, together with £5,800.

On the death of John James Tayler, in 1869, Dr. Martineau became Principal of Manchester College, and while giving part of his professional work into the hands of the Rev. C. B. Upton, remained in office and continued to lecture until 1885, when he was eighty years of age.

What he was to his students can never be fully expressed in words, but we are happy to be allowed to add to this imperfect notice the personal testimony of a number of the students themselves, belonging to different generations, and including some of those who as teachers are now carrying on the work of the College.

Closing Years.

When Dr. Martineau resigned his office as Principal of Manchester College, he was chosen President and occupied the chair at the celebrations of the centenary of the College, in 1886. He did not relinquish his professorial duties that he might cease from work. He had been continually perfecting his courses of College lectures, and now showed in the completed volumes, the "Types of Ethical Theory," published 1885, and "A Study of Religion," published 1888, what his teaching had been. These books were published by the Clarendon Press, and in the latter year Oxford University offered a tardy honour to the great teacher, by presenting him with the honorary degree of D.C.L.

Harvard had been first with such recognition, sending him an LL.D. in 1872; Leyden followed in 1875 with S.T.D.; then Edinburgh with its D.D.; and after Oxford, Dublin with Litt.D. Thus was the venerable Doctor clothed with abundant honour, but more, perhaps, than by any such degree he was gratified by the address presented on his eighty-third birthday, signed by Tennyson, Browning, Jowett, Bradley, Zeller, Renan, Pfleiderer, Lipsuis, Kuenen, Oort, Tiele, Wallace, Cheyne, Sanday, Phillips Brooks, Réville, Max Müller, Lecky, Lowell, Seeley, Lubbock, Holman Hunt, Mrs. Humphry Ward, Stopford Brooke, Roscoe, Bryce, Trevellyan, Stansfeld, Hutton, and many others, expressive of reverence and affection, and recording his services to truth, to spiritual religion, and the Christian life.

To this Dr. Martineau replied:—"To such an escort down the declining path of life, what can an old man do but throw out a few faltering words of thanks, and love and reverence? The studies and duties of my life have centred upon subjects which at once draw men into closest union and part them in widest severance, and so render the due combination of intensity with catholicity of affection one of the rarest of human excellencies. All the more striking is the abounding evidence of its presence in the list of names attached to your address."

Yet in his heart of hearts what he valued most was the constant loyalty and affection of Manchester College, which had no degree to give, but with which so great a part of his life had been intimately associated; and on the College no greater honour could have been conferred than to have him on the roll of its students and professors. The College Library preserves two memorials—the noble statue by Mr. H. R. Hope-Pinker, of which a picture is included in this number, and the portrait by Mr. G. F. Watts, presented to the College in 1874. Noble as that is, in its conception of the spiritual character of the man, it was painted during a very trying period of Dr. Martineau's life, and we are thankful to have also the later portrait by Mr. Alfred Emslie, painted in 1888, of which we give a reproduction, and which shows more of the radiance of beautiful old age, which was so striking in Dr. Martineau's latter years.

Mrs. Martineau died in the late autumn of 1877, his sister Harriet having passed away in the summer of the previous year. He himself retained a marvellous vigour almost to the very end of his life, and enjoyed to the full the pleasures of his summer home among the Scottish mountains. The publication of his books was not the only token of his continued strength. In 1888 he brought his suggestions for church organisation before the National Conference at Leeds, in a speech of astonishing grasp, and three years later gave a course of Sunday afternoon lectures in connection with Mrs. Humphry Ward's settlement at University Hall. The scheme for organising on the Presbyterian plan was not adopted, but Dr. Martineau's speech in bringing it forward contained these memorable sentences:—"If any one, being a Unitarian, shrinks, on fitting occasion, from plainly calling himself so, he is a sneak and a coward. If, being of our catholic communion, he calls his chapel or its congregation Unitarian, he is a traitor to his spiritual ancestry, and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors."

That was with him a settled conviction. He was himself a Unitarian, as no reader of "The Seat of Authority in Religion" could for a moment doubt, and to the end of his life he was a member of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; but he would know nothing of a Unitarian Church. Thus in 1868 he had joined in the attempt to establish a "Free Christian Union," and his paper on "New Affinities of Faith," included among the Essays, remains to bear witness to his ideal; so also his address at the Hope-street stone-laying. The Church, as a brotherhood of worshippers, he said, must have convictions; but these must not be bound upon the Church to limit any possible growth in the open future.

Dr. Martineau was present at the opening of Manchester College, Oxford, in October, 1893, and gave an address at the Communion Service in the College Chapel, which will never be forgotten by those who were privileged to take part in the service. When he was ninety he received a deputation from the College at his house in Gordon-square, and made a speech of acknowledgements to the birthday address, describing his early religious experiences and looking back upon the course of his philosophical studies. Latterly his strength failed, and last summer he was not able to undertake the accustomed journey to Scotland. At the beginning of the present year his household was prostrated by influenza, and his eldest daughter, Mrs. Leyson Lewis, who had been nursing her sisters, succumbed. Dr. Martineau himself, after a day or two of restless weariness, quietly fell asleep on the evening of Thursday, Jan. 11.

The funeral service at Highgate Cemetery, on Tuesday, the 16th, was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Dr. Martineau's successor as Principal of Manchester College.

REMINISCENCES BY OLD STUDENTS IN MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

I.

BY WILLIAM H. HERFORD, B.A.

Student from 1837 to 1842.

Accepting as an honour the request to add a few Memoranda to the Memorial of Dr. James Martineau, it is painful to admit that the title of an intimate personal pupil is not mine.

The greatness of his genius as a writer, and in a sense the possibilities of English style, dawned upon the novice, when in preparing an Essay for the end of my College course (1842) I read the Preface to Martineau's "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home." Many readings and hearings have deepened and confirmed that first impression; but no subsequent study, not even the unmatched splendour of "The Seat of Authority in Religion," has dimmed the wonder of that youthful experience. Perhaps the most real of the goods of old age is that the aged know—at first hand—matters which to juniors are vague as well as trite. Of Presbyterian parentage, brought up to accept the names "Protestant" and "Dissenter," bestowed on us by persecuting Diet or Parliament, as our proper designation; looking upon Priestley and Channing as our patron Saints; for myself, loving as my spiritual father the gentle and unflinching John James Tayler; I remember James Martineau spoken of as a young man, supremely able and extremely dangerous; capable—as was adduced in all-embracing evidence—"of preaching away all the miracles of the Old Testament in one sermon." As years went on, and we juniors attacked "for better for worse" our tasks of life, the spell of his insight and eloquence strengthened. As to all intelligent Britain—England, Old and New—as to most of enlightened Europe, Martineau has, to me, long stood alone; the furthest-sighted, as well as the most eloquent of those "Seekers after God" who have not despaired of the Christian Commonwealth. Moving on, ohne Rast, ohne Hast, like the step of Time—flinging down the False, letting fall the Worn-out, pushing aside the Trivial—he stands as the Prophet who sets on the surest basis that august theory of a Personal yet Universal Father, which was the Theology of Jesus.

Looking back through half a century of ever-growing discipleship, I feel that what has always spoken most vividly to my own sense of truth and beauty has been Martineau's intense love and veneration for "the Man, Christ Jesus." In his earliest writings, Jesus was for him actually the crowning flower of Humanity. This thought must have dwelt in his mind from the first, as it often escapes in his utterances. Throughout the first discourse of the "Endeavours" (1843), Jesus is the truest representative of both God and Man. In the third discourse, we find these words: "The doctrine of the Incarnation faithfully represents the impression produced by the ministry and character of Christ. It is the dark shadow thrown across the ages of Christendom by his mortal life, as it inevitably sinks into the distance." In the concluding book of "The Seat of Authority in Religion"—his "last best gift" to the coming age, for it is not understanded of the present—Martineau has, I believe, fixed for the Church of the Future a depicture of the life and work of Jesus which will live after the various "Lives"—German, French, and English—have slowly lost their glow, like cooling metal, or flashed out of ken like meteorites. On one of the too rare occasions when intimate converse with Dr. Martineau was my precious privilege, he said (of that work): "I was determined that no one should have an excuse for not knowing what I really meant." In this fifth book Martineau makes clear, to those who have eyes to see, that the Messiahship of Jesus, and his miracles; the "higher" views of his nature, in Paul, in Ep. Hebrews, in Fourth Gospel; that the Eternal Sonship, the secondary Godhead of the Nicene Age—on to pseudo-Athanasian equality—are all shadows, growing ever deeper, more solid, more defined as the luminary descends lower into time. These Martineau shows to have been natural, inevitable; no fiction, no human inventions, but sincere efforts to utter the ineffable. In other words, the "seen and temporal;" what was real to first disciples, to apostolic age, to post-apostolic age; what was sealed in Nicene Creed, fixed as on adamant in the quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus of the Dark Ages: is indeed the "earthen-vessel" wherein was preserved the unseen and eternal "Treasure" of the spiritual Headship of Jesus. To have shown the way to retrace steps, erring yet blameless, which had carried Christ from the manger of Bethlehem to the throne of God; to unwind the successive swaddling-clothes of Deity, Messiahship, Miracle, and find at last the true son of Man, our brother and our Lord—"the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever"—is for me the sum of James Martineau's achievement.

II.

BY DR. JAMES DRUMMOND, PRINCIPAL OF MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

Student from 1856 to 1859.

As a pupil, and for many years a colleague, of Dr. Martineau's, I may be allowed to write a few words recording some of my own impressions of his character and influence. It is impossible for me to attempt, in a brief space, to estimate his rank in the world of letters and of thought. That would be a task beyond my competence; and my humbler purpose is to offer a tribute of reverence and affection to the memory of one to whom I owe so much, and with whom, for so long a time, I was closely associated. And yet I do not feel that I can draw a portrait of the man whose image stands so vividly before me, or present him to others as he appears to my inward eye; and I must be content to place on record a few prominent reminiscences of the great teacher and thinker.

What I most distinctly remember from my student days is the sense of that personal fascination which proceeds, not from any single characteristic, but from the whole spirit of a man, that subtle power by which one soul lays hold upon another, and translates it into an ideal world. The feelings thus excited can be compared only to those of a lover. Merely to see and hear him was a pure delight, and, as was said of Burke, it seemed that, "whenever he opened his mouth, pearls and diamonds dropped from him." And yet this power was combined with a certain aloofness, due no doubt in part to absorption in his work, but partly, I think, to humility and a natural shyness, which made him shrink from attempting to exert a direct personal pressure. It was accordingly in the fulfilment of College or public duties that his influence was most felt. The short morning services in the Library, when conducted by him, carried us into the Holy Presence, and left a consecration on our day; and his sermons in Little Portland-street Chapel seemed to pierce to our own most secret wants, and to surround us with an atmosphere of heavenly contemplation.

In matters more purely intellectual his influence must have varied according to the nature of the mind to which his thoughts were addressed; but none could fail to acknowledge the force and beauty of his lectures. His appearance in the class-room at once arrested our attention, and prepared us for an hour of intellectual delight; for an expression of power was stamped on every lineament of his face, and we anticipated a keen and illuminating discussion of some important problem. If it is not trifling to say so, the effect of the noble face, so full of concentrated thought, was enhanced by a great mass of dark hair which used to tumble loosely over his forehead, and made me often compare him (in my own mind) to a Jupiter tonans. And then came the lecture, written in the most finished style, replete with subtle reasoning, brilliant metaphor, and searching insight, delivered somewhat slowly, so that good notes could be taken, and at the same time with all the expressiveness of his musical and varied tones. He always gave us of his best, so that his lectures were undoubtedly above the level of students who had not had sufficient mental training, or who had no taste for philosophical discussion. It may be that in the pure realm of thought his influence was less than in the wider spiritual field to which I have already alluded; and many have felt the inspiration of his teaching who have been unable to follow him in all his conclusions. It has sometimes seemed to me (but my opinion on such a point is probably worthless) that his critical and analytical genius was greater than his speculative, and that within the spiritual field the element of conscience was so dominant as to give a distinctive colour to his thought, and to make it difficult for him to sympathise with men whose minds were cast in a different mould. Perhaps one result of this was an earnestness of conviction which occasionally imparted to his reasoning an appearance of being more controversial than judicial. Nevertheless, difference in opinion could make no difference in his friendship, and the triumphant eagerness with which he sometimes stated a conviction was due entirely to his view of the evidence, and was absolutely untinged by that self-love which makes one impatient of contradiction or dissent. It was one of his most valuable and beautiful traits as a teacher, that he not only taught us to be candid and independent in our judgment, but always treated our immature opinions with a serious courtesy. He thus showed his sympathy with the heart of a learner. He knew that convictions which might seem to his riper experience one-sided or ill-founded were held and prized with all the fiery ardour of youth; and when, as in our periodical debates, he had occasion to controvert them, he reasoned against them with all the wealth of language and argument which he would have used towards the most notable antagonist. In his private criticisms (for instance, of our sermons) he followed a different plan. He would drop some gentle hint, perhaps in the form of a question, and then pass on, leaving some fruitful seed of thought to germinate with our expanding years.

To write of him as a colleague and chief is not easy, for my experience of colleagues has been so unalloyed with painful elements from the time when I began my ministry with a beloved and sweet-souled man, the Rev. William Gaskell, that it seems almost a necessity of nature that colleagues should be the most delightful of mankind. Yet one can see that, in the abstract, it might be otherwise. Suffice it, then, to say that the years in which we laboured together were a time of pure and unbroken harmony, in which I once more listened with the old feelings to the well-remembered tones, and looked up with the old reverence to the strong and controlling character, and trusted the judgment which was exercised with such perfect impartiality. Ἐμοὶ μὲν δὴ ἐδόκει τοιοῦτος εἶναι, οἷος ἂν εἴη ἄριστός τε ἀνὴρ καὶ εὐδαιμονέστατος.

III.

BY CHARLES B. UPTON, B.A., B.SC., PROFESSOR OF PHILOSOPHY IN MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

Student from 1853 to 1859.

My entrance to Manchester New College occurred just at the time when the College left Manchester and entered upon the London period of its history. At first Dr. Martineau used to come up fortnightly from Liverpool to lecture to us, but after a while he resigned Hope-street Church and removed to London. I well remember the warm interest which his lectures excited, and one evidence of this was the great efforts we students made to possess and preserve verbatim reports of all his college utterances. At that time those of us who graduated at the London University had been forced to the dreary task of "getting up" for examination purposes Dr. Bain's manuals of mental and moral science, and the change from this form of philosophy to the inspiring lectures which awaited us at the College, as soon as we entered on the divinity course, was of the most striking and gratifying nature. The philosophy we had crammed up in our undergraduate days denied the freedom of the will, resolved all ethics into experiences of pleasure and pain, and offered no reliable basis for a belief in personal immortality. But on entering the class-room of Manchester New College we changed all this, and listened with delight to philosophical teaching which was not only exquisite in beauty and eloquence of expression, but accorded admirably with what was deepest in our moral and spiritual experience, and was most helpful and stimulating to us as students preparing for the ministry of religion. And not only had we the privilege of listening to our great teacher in the class-room, but on Sundays it was a joy and an inspiration to hear from living lips several of those grand sermons which are now happily made the permanent possession of the religious world in the "Hours of Thought." Dr. Martineau's teaching at this time was not only very valuable for its conclusive refutation of the sensational idealism of the two Mills and Professor Bain, but it was perhaps still more serviceable to us in relation to that new phase of theological Agnosticism which Herbert Spencer had expounded in his "First Principles," and which had also produced a great sensation in the religious world through Dean Mansel's "Bampton Lectures." I well remember the eagerness with which some of us students turned to the National Review to read Dr. Martineau's fine defence of a rational theism in the article on "Mansel's Limits of Religious Thought," and his magnificent criticism of Mr. Spencer's new-fangled Worship of the Unknowable in the article on "Science, Nescience, and Faith."

Thus fortified in my religious faith by Dr. Martineau's profound thought and keen spiritual insight, I began to try to give some expression in the pages of the Theological Review to the ideas which I had gained in the lecture-room of Manchester New College, and after some years spent in teaching and in the ministry at Toxteth Park, I was in 1875 invited to become one of the teaching-staff of the College, where for ten years I had still the advantage of intercourse with my revered teacher who was then the Principal of the College. A new and most precious opportunity of gaining a further insight into Dr. Martineau's thought and personal character was at this time afforded me by the great kindness of Dr. Martineau and his family; for at their invitation I for about twenty years spent two or three weeks of my annual holiday in Dr. Martineau's charming Highland home in Rothiemurchus Forest. And here I feel quite ashamed to say how, in my great eagerness to get light thrown by Dr. Martineau on all my mental perplexities, I used to ask philosophical questions in season and out of season, introducing the subject now at meal times, and now again when we were toiling up the steep sides of mighty Cairngorm or Ben-muick-dhui. I well deserved to be snubbed for these unseasonable obtrusions of my favourite topic; but never shall I forget the indulgent patience with which the Doctor heard and replied to the several statements of my difficulties. In later years I at times ventured to differ from him on some points, and he considered that my views sometimes came dangerously near to Pantheism; but nothing could exceed the courtesy and kindness with which he listened to my arguments and gave me in return his well-weighed opinion. These visits to the Polchar opened my eyes to a side of Dr. Martineau's beautiful and noble nature, of which I should otherwise have had but a very inadequate conception; I mean the considerate tenderness and warmth of his heart. In his own house and at his own table, as well as on those frequent mountain excursions which he and his daughters were so fond of planning, he spared no pains to add to the happiness and the interest of his visitors. With advancing age his nature seemed to mellow and to become even more sweetly sympathetic.

Personal contact with him never failed to raise his friends and visitors to a higher spiritual level. Never was there a man in whose soul there shone and burned more constantly those grand and inspiring ideas—

> Which ever find us young
> And ever keep us so.

One indication of the great elasticity of his mind I may mention in conclusion. Of late years his daughters took the greatest care that he should not undertake more in the way of mountain climbing than was quite safe, but he himself still retained the conviction that he possessed the needful energy for doing much more; and even so late as the summer of 1898, while being driven by his daughter-in-law through those parts of Rothiemurchus which skirt the Cairngorms, he said to me, "Do you know, I believe that I could even now manage to mount to a good height on these glorious mountains." And for him assuredly these Grampian hills he loved so well typified also those sublime heights of philosophical and spiritual vision to which his genius so often soared and whither his lofty thoughts have uplifted so many minds and hearts.

IV.

BY RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A., MINISTER OF HOPE-STREET CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

Student from 1860 to 1866.

Others will write in the pages of THE INQUIRER and elsewhere of the place of James Martineau in the history of thought and the relation of his religious philosophy to the age in which he lived. For my part, I desire simply to find vent for the expression of a gratitude which cannot be measured. Dr. Martineau has had students of much higher philosophical training than mine; he has had none, I venture to think, to whom his teaching has been more luminous, or to whom it has accorded in larger measure that rest in a complete and rounded conception of God and the Universe which is the fundamental craving of the thinking man. I do not mean that his philosophy leaves no mysteries, no dark or unfathomed places; far indeed from that. But it affords that luminous unity of conception which confers intellectual peace, and promises in due order a solution, when their time shall come, to the problems that remain.

It is because some of his students appear to have passed so far away from his modes of thought, and to look upon his system as already in a large measure discredited, that I desire, with unspeakable reverence and gratitude, to record that to me his thinking has been intellectually and spiritually life and light and breath.

Not that I am able to think with him all along the line. I have never, for example, been able to accept unqualified his theory of the scale of ethical motive. I have no quarrel with the moral order in which he ranges the springs of action; but I have never been able to shake off the belief that some quantitative measure is necessary in weighing motive against motive, in addition to the qualitative estimate—that a large measure of a comparatively less exalted motive may rightly preponderate over a small measure of its superior.

But the two great contentions in which Martineau has held my mind captive ever since I have been able to understand him are these:—1. The argument to God as Power from our inalienable sense of cause; 2. The argument to God as Righteousness from the experience of conscience. Since I have understood Martineau on these two great themes, I have been able to think no other. I have had here that sense of thinking in accordance with the fundamental and eternal essence of things which is the supreme intellectual enfranchisement and joy. There are thoughts which once uttered in philosophy, though previously unformulated, take rank forthwith as necessary laws of thought—laws along which men think involuntarily and inevitably. Such have been the law of gravitation, and in our time the law of evolution. Such to me have been, since I first grasped them, Martineau's theistic arguments from cause and conscience.

To this I think I may be allowed to add a certain record which has personal bearings, since it is of unquestionable interest and value. In February, 1897, soon after I had published my little book, "God and the Soul," I had the privilege of spending an hour or two with Dr. Martineau at his house in Gordon-square. He made some kind references to my essay. I had contended that man's acquaintance with God rests on three primary faculties—the understanding through which he recognises God as Cause, the conscience through which he recognises him as Righteousness, and the sense of beauty through which he recognises him (not through any dialectic, but by immediate intuition) as Love. But Martineau's own Theism had always been built on the first two of these bases only. Moreover, my own suggestion of a third had been pretty severely handled, publicly or privately, by distinguished pupils of Martineau's. It was, therefore, with some inward tremor that I asked him whether he thought I was justified in building, and in my mode of building, on that third foundation. His reply was a wonderfully cordial and unqualified assent. In answer to a further inquiry, he added that he considered that the argument was quite qualified to rank in importance, and to be co-ordinated with, his own two great arguments from the concept of causality and from conscience. When I told him how some of my Unitarian friends had protested against the validity of this section of my essay, he ascribed their dissent to a certain dryness and lack of imagination which he deemed characteristic of Unitarians. He said that he had over and over again met with the intuition of the Divine Love from the contemplation of beauty in persons of the artistic temperament, and he touchingly recalled its strength and vividness in a beloved child of his own who had passed behind the veil in early years.

Such was the most interesting part of the last conversation I was privileged to enjoy with our great master. While some of his old pupils are striking out new paths of philosophy and criticism, my own prayerful ambition is to be enabled, with however feeble pen or faltering tongue, to convey to some few of those who knew him not in the flesh some reflection of the glory of his thought in the things of the Spirit.

V.

BY J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., HIBBERT LECTURER, AND FORMERLY VICE-PRINCIPAL OF MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

Student from 1860 to 1866.

My recollections of Dr. Martineau begin with the conversion of the library at University Hall in 1853 for the purposes of Manchester New College. His tall, spare figure, often rapid and decided in movement, but never without dignity, occasionally passed in and out among the rising shelves, and attracted my boyish gaze with a dim and distant wonder. After his removal to London, the family friendship and a common attendance at the dear old chapel at Rosslyn Hill, Hampstead, brought me occasionally within his range. So I was prepared to come face to face with him one summer evening in 1860, when I went down to University Hall to be examined for entrance into Manchester New College. His gentleness, his exquisite courtesy, his singular consideration for a boy still at school, made an ineffaceable impression on me.

Our undergraduate studies proceeded under his close supervision. We read with him some Latin or Greek book; he examined us periodically in English and history; and he guarded us against the desolations of the sensational philosophy which then reigned under the influence of Professor Bain at Burlington House. These arrangements secured for us the great advantage of some personal intercourse with him before we entered on our theological work; we became in some degree familiar with modes of thought and expression which would otherwise have at first bewildered us. The contents of his teaching, in the form finally given to it more than twenty years later, are now known to all. In his method as a lecturer he followed the tradition of an older day. The same prelections were slowly read from year to year, without any attempt to make divisions of time correspond to divisions of the subject, to an audience which might consist only of one. Those of us who had procured copies from our predecessors, corrected our transcripts by aid of the living voice; if sometimes one, more daring than the rest, remained behind to ask a question, or raise a difficulty, he was invariably met with the utmost kindness, the lecturer with unfailing insight and precision assisted the struggling idea to shape itself and supplied the answer, but the incident passed and the method remained unchanged. Yet in spite of this reserve, we knew that we were confronted by a great personality. His never-failing punctuality, his dignity of manner, the noble lines stamped clear upon his face, the deep tones of his voice, even the "sumptuous simplicity" (as one of his hearers called it) of his little apparatus—the morocco portfolio, the large page of MS. unspoiled by correction or erasure, the ivory paper-knife, and (in cold weather) the almost regal robe of fur-lined purple cloth—all these seemed but the external harmony of the inner greatness which gesture and words alike conveyed. He seemed to us as one of the kings of thought, who could not be approached lightly; we felt for him a homage of reverence amounting sometimes almost to awe; when we heard a senior speak of him familiarly by a nick-name, it awoke within us a kind of horror and disgust as if a sanctity had been profaned. His immense range of knowledge amazed us; the force of his genius carried us away; but the elevation of his character, and a certain intrinsic majesty of mind, seemed to set him above us far beyond our reach. In his treatment of his subject he presented his own view with a power that swept all other competitors out of the field*; as a critic he was unrivalled in keenness and subtlety; but in exposition of what he felt to be moral and religious truth he spoke rather as a prophet than a philosopher. Argument, indeed, was never wanting, adorned with the utmost literary grace; yet he reverted again and again to the primary capacities and aspirations of the soul, as though he would make us feel their worth, and learn to see even as he saw.

This attitude was, of course, absolutely natural to him, but it instinctively changed when he became the interpreter of the ideas of another; and in our readings of Plato we were brought nearer to him, as he insisted on the utmost exactitude of rendering, and taught us the delicate shades of difference among the particles, or indicated the balance and relation of the clauses of a sentence. Yet even here his method was severe. He dealt only with the text immediately before him. The general scope of the dialogue, the windings of the argument, the place of its topic in Plato's scheme of thought, he left the student to work out for himself; but by the exquisite felicity of his own renderings he would shoot a sudden ray of light among our difficulties, and some unexpected word seemed to make all clear.

Nearest of all did we come to him if he gave us back a sermon. When it was first read aloud he occasionally permitted himself some epigrammatic comment. Echoes come back to me out of the Council Room at University Hall, such as the summary of one discourse as "The Whole Duty of Man in Twenty Minutes," or the remark on another (which had dealt largely with Jewish antiquities), "Excellent Mr. ——; but I was waiting for the sermon"; or the comparison of a third to a "diorama which moved very fast and had nobody to explain it." But though when he spoke to us alone his words were few, their appreciation was often so deep that they made us feel that in any time of difficulty we could go to him for advice, and he would exactly understand our trial. He once, indeed, said that he had been beset all his life by an almost unconquerable shyness. This might seem amazing, yet it did sometimes set a seal upon his lips; in presence of a great sorrow, speech seemed like desecration. But in his letters this reserve was abandoned, and the richness of his sympathy had full play. The generosity of his correspondence filled one again and again with astonishment; and the same splendid willingness to give himself marked his administration as superintendent of the Portland Sunday-schools, in which it was my happy privilege to be associated with him for two years.

Nine years later I returned to Manchester New College as his junior colleague. He was then seventy; it seemed like the prime of life. In the last decade of his principalship the former course on "Ethics" was expanded and wrought into perfect form and the "Study of Religion" took the place of what used to be known as "Grounds and Truths." That he should work to the last was not surprising. His physical vigour was still so marvellously preserved that at eighty, after the strain involved in his farewells to the College, he climbed Scafell Pike with us the next week. Those ten years intensified tenfold the impressions of my College days. A wider experience enabled me the better to estimate his transcendent genius and nobility. The meaning of it all was clearer, as one realised the glorious gifts which he had devoted to the College. Nothing could exceed the magnanimity with which he left his colleagues absolute freedom to carry out their own plans; and we never ceased to admire his grasp of College business, his statesman-like skill in preparing memoranda for the Committee, his mastery of rival pleas in our monthly debates, his wonderful felicity of characterisation, his power of looking straight into the heart. Those who had the privilege of close association with him in fellow-work, will always count those years as among the most inspiring in their lives.

* "Martineau," said one of his undergraduate hearers once somewhat brusquely, "is a very bad lecturer, for he makes you feel that he's always right. Now it stands to reason that he can't be always!"

VI.

BY HENRY SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.

Student from 1868-1872.

One day when Dr. Martineau was reading Plato with his class, we came upon the passage where Socrates speaks of himself as having spent his life talking philosophy to two or three boys in a corner. "Humph," interpolated our teacher, "this seems to have been written with a prevision of Manchester New College." We laughed and passed on, but the remark was strikingly suggestive of our feeling towards our teacher and of our conviction about his relation to the larger world. Just as we knew that all schools of Greek philosophy had to make a fresh start from Socrates, so we believed, and some of us do still believe, that the philosophy of the next century will have to come "back to Martineau," and build upon the foundation he has laid in his recognition of the ultimate facts of human consciousness. We might be two or three lads in a corner (of Gordon-square), but we never felt condemned to provincial obscurity on that account. We knew we had a place in the great history of human thought, and we esteemed very highly our privilege of being the first to learn those truths concerning moral and religious philosophy which, in the course of another hundred years or so, would win universal recognition. I don't think this feeling had any tendency to make us priggish. Through no merit of our own, but as our great good fortune, here were we favoured with a mighty trust. Moreover, Martineau himself warned us in his own lectures that in many respects he was but a pioneer, that his conjectures were tentative and would need the correction of later thinkers. We never imagined that he had elaborated a faultless system; but we believed he showed us principles eternal as human nature, certain as the facts of consciousness. This conviction prevented our suffering from the smallness of our surroundings. Things looked small because we were at the beginning; we stood at the fountain-head of a stream destined to become a great river.

The unfailing punctuality with which his lectures were delivered helped to sustain our sense of their importance. One day a bearded stranger, clad in a big felt hat and long black cloak, mounted the steps of University Hall, and asked me if Mr. Martineau was there, and receiving the answer that he was, but was engaged with a class, proceeded, to my amazement, to interrupt that class; and, instead of being rebuked for his audacity, actually carried off our Principal a good quarter of an hour before the time was up! It soon dawned upon us that the visitor was none other than Alfred Tennyson; and we afterwards heard that he came to fetch Martineau to a special meeting of the Metaphysical Society, held at Haslemere. So we thought that under these special circumstances his conduct might be condoned, yet with a distinct feeling that such a breach of rules required much for its justification. Indeed, I remember no other occasion on which Martineau deprived us of ten minutes of the time allotted to us for the sake of any of the host of engagements that must have been pressed upon him in London; and I believe many generations of his students can bear me out in recognising the supreme importance he attached to the discharge of his duties to his "boys in a corner."

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.

While the sense of loss is so fresh in all our hearts it is very difficult to express our feelings in words or to say what we owe to Dr. Martineau. I am sure that I owe him more than I realise, and much more than I can set down in writing. There is some comfort when men and women live to a full age and seem thus to have large opportunity to accomplish all the work which it has been given them to do; and yet when men grow wiser and nobler with the years, when their experience deepens and their influence extends, when many memories and associations and affections gather round them in ever-increasing number year by year, then the fact that they are old makes it harder, not easier, to let them go. The old must in a full age be taken from us, and to them there is no cause for tears; but for us sorrow, not gratitude, comes first. We feel the world is poorer because that gracious presence is no longer here. He has passed away in this sad time when so many younger men are falling too, and we feel he also was young, ever learning, ever seeking with open mind more light. He leaves with us a sense of loneliness and grief as we turn to face the great religious problems of our time and try, according to our strength, to realise the love of God and do His will amidst the turmoil and darkness and misery in which we live.

Dr. Martineau spent much of his time lecturing "to a few boys in a corner." His "boys" must all feel that the time spent with him was full of far-reaching influence on their religion and their thought. The form of our theology, our ethics, our ideals, whether we know it or not, is largely derived by us from him. He moulded our thought, not by dogmatism, but by helping us to think; he raised and directed our ideals by the beauty of his character. He shamed us out of our sordid ambitions when we saw in him such true greatness, united with such carelessness of all applause and show. I came under his influence only in the latest years of his teaching life, at a time when he had ceased to preach and when his personal relationship with students was confined chiefly to the lecture-room. I remember his rich, deep, gentle voice: his wonderful humility, his exquisite graciousness and eager sympathy.

He was so simple that it did not often strike us as a sacrifice that this man, recognised by all religious thinkers as a leader, should spend his time in training a dozen very ordinary youths; and yet underneath we did feel a little of the privilege, and we did, perhaps unconsciously, respond to the appeal which such a sacrifice must make. I remember the rather bare puritanic lecture-room, and the students, sometimes dull or frivolous at other lectures, but always touched by reverence with him; and best of all I remember that beautiful face, severe, tender, lined by thought and knowledge of suffering and knowledge of God. It was a benediction which sank into our lives. The time will come for estimating what he was to English religious life and our little group of churches. Then we shall speak of his battle with Agnosticism, and of how he strove to raise our churches out of sectarian littleness and provincial ways. But now the hearts of all of us who felt his gracious personality are filled with grief and gratitude: grief that his last word to us on earth is spoken; and gratitude, which I think will grow even greater with the years, for his influence upon our life and thoughts.

DR. MARTINEAU'S MINISTRY IN HOPE STREET CHURCH.

BY FRANCES E. COOKE.

A GREAT teacher and inspirer has passed behind the veil, and multitudes of various sects, in many lands, unite in honouring his memory and in acknowledging their deep debt of gratitude for the truth he has taught. Among this great company, there is an inner circle composed of members of the special branch of the Christian Church which has looked up to him as its head—elders among us who have long held fellowship and communion with him, and disciples and learners, who own, with grateful reverence, that the first springs of their religious life were fed by him.

I venture to try to fulfil the request made to me to record some memorial of his work as minister in Hope-street Church. When the long history of his life is given to the world, his ministry in Liverpool will form no small portion of it, and there are those still living who can doubtless vividly recall the influence he exercised in its earlier years by his high moral teaching, on the commercial life of the town, and by his controversial writings on its theology, while the treasured volumes of the "Endeavours after the Christian Life" bear witness now to the spiritual religion which was preached in Paradise-street Chapel.

Concerning that later ministry in Hope-street Church, it is difficult to realise that there, too, his pulpit services must be numbered among the sacred memories of the far past. But on all who were privileged to attend those services must remain forever impressed his unique personality and gracious dignity of bearing, and the tones of the voice which still seem to echo in the hearing as the eye reads sentences that may have been first heard in childhood and never afterwards forgotten. Many later associations have enriched Hope-street Church but, apart from these associations, the memories of the earliest years of its history, during which, Sunday after Sunday, James Martineau spoke within its walls the words of prayer and praise and exhortation, have made it a sacred shrine.

Of this period in his ministry there is one episode which may chance to be unnoticed among numerous and weightier memories—an episode which it is, perhaps, specially valuable in these days to call to mind.

To partake of the Communion for the first time, Dr. Martineau held to be a specially solemn act—a kind of confirmation service for the young, who were stepping out from the home circle of early days to take upon themselves untried responsibilities. When, at one time, his congregation contained many who thus stood upon the threshold of a wider life, he invited them to study with him the history of the rite of Communion, to clear away all false conceptions, and discover for themselves what remained of personal value to them in the service as a help to strengthen their aspirations and deepen their inner life. To this end, for many months, he held a weekly class for young people for the purpose of narrating to them the development of doctrines in relation to the Lord's Supper, and laying before them various views concerning the rite. Criticism ended, early one Sunday morning, he met the intending communicants, and delivered the "Confirmation Address," which was to be followed, after the usual morning worship, by the celebration of the Communion—an address which could never pass away from the memories of those who listened to it.

To simply record this event in the ministry connected with Hope-street Church is all that can be done. The gratitude and reverence of those who were thus influenced by him at the most important epoch of their lives must remain untold; still less can be recorded the story of awakened consciences and of young lives led to dedicate themselves in discipleship to Christ. It may not be unsuitable to quote here the closing words in the Confirmation Address.

"The chief feature of the rite of Communion, is that it identifies the disciples with their Master in his moment of utter humiliation and surrender, and so bears witness to the great truth that the very essence and crown of our religion is self-sacrifice. If the first Communion is, in some sense, a transition from home dependence to a spiritual life of your own, it is not an escape into self-will, but a dedication to self-sacrifice. You disengage yourself from blind usage, from mechanical necessity, from unthinking routine, not in favour of less and lighter obedience, but of more and deeper; not to be freer of burdensome exactions of duty, but, on the contrary, to pay yourself entirely away — to receive nothing—to follow simply the lead of him that "pleased not himself," and "took on him the form of a servant," and "humbled himself to the death of the cross." We cannot embrace his cross, and yet refuse our own. We cannot raise the cup of his remembrance to our lips without a secret pledge to him, to one another, to the great company of faithful in every age, that we, too, hold ourselves at God's disposal, that we will ask nothing on our own account, that we will pass simply into the Divine hand to take us whither it will. Be this the vow of our hearts; and "so let us take of this bread and drink of this cup."

DR. MARTINEAU'S SERMONS.

BY FRANCES POWER COBBE.

It was a perpetual and tantalising enigma to the regular attendants in Little Portland-street Chapel, how it happened that men and women, ostensibly capable of appreciating Dr. Martineau's sermons, so often put in an appearance once or twice and never returned. The explanation which commends itself to me is that such good people listened to the great preacher in a somewhat distracted state of mind, having expected his discourse to fall into one or other of certain familiar categories, and, finding it impossible to pigeon-hole them according to their anticipations, they went away sorrowful, for they had great (pre)possessions.

I was myself for a time in this predicament, like other stragglers from the fold of the Church of England We did not, indeed, expect Dr. Martineau's sermons to resemble those on which Tennyson's Lincolnshire farmer passed his approval—

I thowt a said whot a owt to 'a said, an' I coom'd awaäy—

nor did we precisely anticipate the style of discourse, also eminently orthodox, wherein an imposing edifice of dogma is built on the foundation of a misinterpreted text, or a sound moral lesson is carefully deduced by bad logic from false history. But what we did go out into the wilderness to see was —as we supposed—a "later Luther and a soldier priest," a reformer whose work was to sweep away old errors like the sands of Egypt, and clear a temple on the rock below. We looked for a Moses who, though filled with all the wisdom of modern science and philosophy, should be yet essentially a prophet, the deliverer of a message, which would, as a matter of course, be clear and definite to our comprehension, to be accepted with joy and gratitude, or possibly to be rejected; but in either case to be plainly given and received.

I feel sure, in looking back, that this was the attitude of many casual attendants at Dr. Martineau's sermons. I freely confess that for a few Sundays my own feelings were rather those of disappointment. I should have liked my spiritual Captain to have entered the field and at once planted a standard, beneath which I could take up a position. I was still young enough to be dogmatic, and to feel that "cock-sureness" of the "curate with the smooth white brow," of which no septuagenarian can ever boast. Theodore Parker's flat denials on one hand, and faith-strong positive assertions on the other, fitted my mental constitution like a key to the wards of its proper lock; and I had passed, not so long since, through years of mental struggle and victory which had left me in the temper of a proselytess. I had taken deeply to heart Mrs. Browning's beautiful idea that religious truth is "like bread at Sacrament" to be passed on, and that it was a paramount duty and joy to help others to reach the sunshine of full Theistic trust in the absolute Goodness of God.

With my mind full of these impressions, which I had tried to put forth in my "Intuitive Morals and Religious Duty," I felt a little bewildered when at last I enjoyed the long-desired privilege of listening to Dr. Martineau, but found, Sunday after Sunday, that no particular error of the old creed had been exposed and extinguished, no definite article of the new brought into relief. The grave, calm eloquence of the Preacher assumed at no time the tone of a Prophet, still less of a Priest or a Professor of Theology. Dr. Martineau never seemed to desire to win us to repeat any shibboleth after him, or to forswear those of any other man or of any Church; and he was even (as it seemed to some of us) quite unaccountably careless about leaving phrases in the devotional part of the service which could not be consistently harmonised with the theology of his sermons. Sometimes we even imagined that he read us an old sermon without remembering to bring its theology up to date. Be this as it may, the sum total of those earliest impressions of Mr. Martineau's sermons was bewildering to a novice in Unitarian worship; and I could well understand how others, puzzled as I was, might be inclined to go elsewhere for their doctrines, desiring to find them clearly labelled and set out, in order due.

But, by degrees, those of us who remained and put aside our fallacious expectations of a teacher whose lessons could be formulated in a catechism, discovered that instead of such a Pedagogue we had found a companion like Great Heart, for the celestial way, with whose mind it was a joy and a benediction to come even for an hour into contact. Once more was proved the truth, that to be is more than to do or to speak; for it was the consciousness, ever growing clear as we knew him better, of what manner of man he was, which made the act of following his thoughts, confidently, admiringly, reverently, in itself uplifting. Mary Carpenter once said to me, when I remarked that I hardly knew on what subject to speak, in my lessons to the poor little girl-thieves in her reformatory: "Say anything. Nothing can pass from your mind to theirs which will not be good for them and give them wholesome subjects for their thoughts, instead of the wretched ones which have filled them in the dens they come from." I suppose that just in the same way on another plane nothing could pass from so lofty and devout a mind as Dr. Martineau's which would not be elevating to ordinary people. We were in high company all the hours we passed in that little chapel, and could not fail to come out of it with the ennobling influence of such association.

I have often compared the experience of listening to one of Dr. Martineau's sermons to the invigoration of a walk over a mountain. There was at the outset the effort—often considerable—to climb the steep and slippery ascent. Then came the breath of purer, keener air, and freer movement; then the outlook over wider horizons, sometimes grand and solemn, sometimes sweet and restful. Finally there was the pause of prayer and adoration on the summit:

> Not vainly did the early Persian make
> His altar in high places, and the peaks
> Of Earth-o'er-gazing mountains, there to seek
> That Being in whose honour shrines are weak
> Upreared by human hands.

Returning from such sermons, the home and daily life, just viewed from the heights above, fell into their true place. Care was minified and Duty magnified, and Affection was strengthened and ennobled, by sympathy felt to be divine and deathless.

It was not till those never to be forgotten sermons came to a sudden ending that we knew how much they had counted for in our inner lives. A window in our chamber was for ever closed, and, like the one in the House called Beautiful, it "looked toward the sun-rising."

LIST OF DR. MARTINEAU'S PUBLICATIONS.

In the following list only the first few sermons which were separately printed are noted in their order; many others were printed, and the chief of these, together with a large number of the articles contributed to reviews are collected in the four volumes published in 1890-1:—

Peace in Division; or, the Duties of Christians in an Age of Controversy. A discourse preached July 7, 1830, in the Prince's-street Meeting-house, Cork, before the Synod of Munster, or Southern Presbyterian Association of Ireland; by James Martineau, Assistant Pastor of the Eustace-street Congregation, Dublin. Published at the request of the Synod. Dublin, 1830. [Reprinted in "Studies of Christianity," 1858.]

A Collection of Hymns for Christian Worship. Printed for the congregation of Eustace-street, Dublin. Edited. 1831.

The Existing State of Theology, as an Intellectual Pursuit, and Religion as a Moral Influence. A sermon preached at the Unitarian Chapel in South-place, Finsbury, on Wednesday, May 21, 1834, being the anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. 1834.

Views of the World from Halley's Comet. A sermon preached in Paradise-street Chapel, Liverpool, Sept. 27, 1835. [Reprinted in Essays, &c., IV. 1891.]

MR. GILL'S BIRTHDAY TRIBUTES TO DR. MARTINEAU.

It has been our privilege to publish from time to time the verses with which the now venerable Thomas Hornblower Gill has greeted Dr. Martineau's recurring birthdays. The close friend and biographer of Franklin Howorth, who was a fellow-student of Martineau's at York, Mr. Gill, while sharing with his friend the movement from the Unitarianism in which they were trained to a piety of more distinctively Evangelical type, retained to the end his unstinted admiration and affection for Dr. Martineau, and only last year sent to him the following half humorous lines on his birthday:—

Revering Youth o'er gifted Eld oft glows,
Warm tributes of admiring verse bestows,
Not often aged luminaries stir
To glowing verse an aged homager.
Here Eld on utmost Eld expends its store,
And eighty homage yields to ninety-four.

We collected last April some of the verses of former years, but cannot refrain from once more reprinting them here.

Of the verses of 1885, with Dr. Martineau's reply, Mr. Gill has been good enough to make a translation for the benefit of un-Latined readers.

April 21, 1885.

Haud rapuit, mirande, tibi octogesimus annus
Corporeas vires robur et ingenii:
Ter felix! pede difficiles ascendere montes
Qui possis; necnon edita mente simul.

The Reply.

Nec tibi restinxit, vates, matura senectus
Fervorem ingenii Pieridumque faces;
Parnassum superans, facilis tu victor abibis
Alis despiciens tædia longa pedis.

(Translation.)

Thine eightieth year thee, wondrous one, doth find
Still strong in body, still supreme in mind;
Thrice happy thou, whose feet steep hills can climb,
Whose genius still can soar to heights sublime.

The Reply.

Nor, Poet, has thy glowing soul been quelled,
Nor has the Muse's fire been quenched by eld.
Parnassus thou victorious dost ascend,
And wingèd watch how slowly footmen wend.

To Plato more than eighty years were granted,
To Kant the same large measure was not scanted,
But Martineau to-day at eighty-eight
Transcends herein each fellow potentate.

What mighty monarch of the realm of thought
At ninety years hath ever reigned and wrought?
Time for our wonder doth his rights forego,
And yields the miracle in Martineau.

Two Birthdays.

April 21 and April 23.

A single day the birthdays doth divide
Of mighty intellects not unallied:
Of him, the height of whose transcendent powers
Above all genius in all ages towers;
Of him the matchless master-mind of ours.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE have been thankful to receive from many sides very cordial expressions of appreciation of the special number of THE INQUIRER issued last week, in memory of Dr. Martineau. A large edition was printed, and the greater part of it is already disposed of. Fresh orders are continually coming in, and it may be wise for our friends to secure at once as many copies as they wish to have, as no further edition will be issued. It has been pleasant to hear of the portrait being framed and hung in chapel vestries, and we trust that the careful packing has secured the safe transit of all copies. If any of our friends are willing to subscribe for that purpose, we should much like to be able to send a considerable number of copies to Free Public Libraries in different parts of the country.

IN our ordinary issue of last week we published extracts from some of the most striking public tributes to Dr. Martineau. Others will be found in the Spectator of Jan. 20, the Athenæum of Jan. 20, the Christian World, the Methodist Times, and the New Age of Jan. 18. From these we hope to give some extracts next week. The Eastern Daily Press of Jan. 15, published at Norwich, contained some very interesting notices, and in the same paper a letter appeared on the following day, from Mr. I. M. Wade, adding some further personal impressions. The Bristol Mercury of June 24 contained a thoughtful appreciation, of which we will quote here the concluding sentences :—

Faithful was his daily effort to follow that Master, who came to show us self-sacrifice, and thereby "spoiled us for self-indulgence." Trials had he, yet they did but reveal his hopes, even as the dark night flings up the flaming stars, while none more truly than this vanished teacher showed the efficacy of the truth he spake when he bade us all be sure that "Prayer for deliverance calls down the power of endurance." Such was he; such was his trust in God, his fealty to Jesus, and his strong and wise love for his fellow-men. And now the earthly presence of that magnetic personality is withdrawn from our sight. Only from the reflection of the days long gone can that earnest gaze of his strike and enchain our inmost souls. Only down the still gallery of abiding memory echo those deep and tender and always persuasive tones that spake at once of wisdom and of kindness.

But "within the veil" there yet lives on, as we hope and believe, the spirit through whose labours our questionings touch us the less harshly, and who has made our trust in God and man, in duty and in immortality all the stronger now. Gladly will those hearts he swayed so surely follow still this clear-sighted teacher of men; for he pleads, as few have more persuasively done, for the "blessed hope of everlasting life," and "he being dead, yet speaketh."

A MEMORIAL lecture is announced to be given on Tuesday evening next, in the schoolroom of Essex Church, by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, on "Dr. Martineau's Life and Teaching." The lecture will be illustrated by a private collection of photographs, shown on the screen, including Dr. Martineau's birth-place, schools and schoolmates, early teachers and friends, later guides, chapels at Norwich, Derby, Nottingham, York, Dublin, Liverpool, and London, various portraits, Manchester College, Oxford, &c. The chair is to be taken by Mr. Richard Worsley, at 8 o'clock.

A CORRESPONDENT from Oxford sends us the following welcome note :—

"It may interest your readers to know that Dr. Fairbairn, preaching at Mansfield College, Oxford, upon the first Sunday of term, paid a tribute of unqualified admiration to Dr. Martineau's nobility of character and intellectual force and subtility. 'The whole religious world is less sorrowing in his death than rejoicing in his life. An English Churchman asked me if Martineau might not be called, like Spinoza, God-intoxicated. It were more fitting to say that he was God-inspired.' The only allusion to divergent opinion was a regret that institutions separate those who are one in spirit."

FOURTEEN years younger than Dr. Martineau, John Ruskin had long since ceased from the eager activities of a life which in its day had been strenuous, as few others, in loyalty to the highest service. His death removes the last great name from the roll of the living prophets of the century. It is interesting to note that the first volume of his "Modern Painters" was published in 1843, in the same year as the first series of Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life." "Within little more than a fortnight of his eighty-first birthday (says the Times) Mr. Ruskin has died at the beautiful home near Coniston, where he had lived in silence and retirement for many years. For the world at large this silence has perhaps led to oblivion; but the faithful, who read and buy fresh editions of his books, knew that he still lived, quietly enjoying the beauty of the landscape and the affectionate care of his friends not able to write or to bear excitement, but happy and tranquil." And a correspondent subsequently told in the columns of the same journal how his life at last "faded away in a peaceful sleep." It was on Saturday evening that he passed away, holding Mrs. Arthur Severn's hand, "amid silence and desolation." But when a little later Mrs. Severn's daughter prevailed upon her to look from his little turret window at the sunset, as Ruskin was wont to look for it from day to day, "The brilliant, gorgeous light illumined the hills with splendour; and the spectators felt as if Heaven's gate itself had been flung open to receive the teacher into everlasting peace."

OF Ruskin the Times in a leading article of Jan. 22 said :—

He constructed an ideal for the artist as well as an ideal of art. He showed the artistic profession that it has a mission like the pulpit. He inculcated upon it self-respect because its art is worthy of respect. If sometimes he bade the public look in a picture gallery for qualities it had no particular right to seek for there, he obliged it at least to use its eyes and test its judgment. Artists have not been tender in their retorts upon their critic. They may be excused for a sense of hurt at his frequent caprices and at his unmeasured severity. They must not be unmindful that they owe the fuller recognition of their title to public admiration and public patronage in no small degree to the blaze of glory with which his meteoric pen has invested their whole vocation. Every painter has risen in stature by virtue of John Ruskin's vindication of the heights to which English art must, and English artists may, aspire.

DR. ST. GEORGE MIVART, F.R.S., who since he was seventeen years of age has been a member of the Roman Catholic Church, but at the same time a man of science, is in revolt against the dominant authority of his Church. Two articles by him appear in this month's Reviews, one on "The Continuity of Catholicism" in the Nineteenth Century, another on "Some recent Catholic Apologists" in the Fortnightly. In the latter Dr. Mivart points out how the advances of science have produced convictions "deemed to be inconsistent with fundamental Christian beliefs, so that no honest man can hold them and continue to conform to the usages of his antecedent creed," and yet maintains that scientific truth must prevail, so that the attitude of Church authority must be modified. In the Nineteenth Century he is even more trenchant and far-reaching in his criticisms and protest, contrasting what he speaks of as "Curialism," the ecclesiastical and political dominance of the Vatican with a true Catholicity, "which desires all truth, justice and rational liberty in religion."

Dr. Mivart seeks to maintain the "continuity of Catholicism" by showing that there is a general movement of thought among educated Catholics, which must eventually prevail; reasonable views of science and evolution and of the Bible are now common, belief in the traditional view of creation and the fall and Old Testament miracles is largely abandoned, and more humane views as to the salvation of non-Catholics, even of the heathen and of unbaptised infants, are held. While the old infallible authority is apparently preserved, it is only by explaining away difficulties, and by an unworthy use of language. Dr. Mivart is anxious to rescue Catholicism from this disastrous position; and gives the following final reason for writing as he has done:—

I have written in the way I have written, because I am convinced that it is only by intellectual breadth; by the welcoming of truth on all sides and from all quarters; by despising nothing that is good, even though it be pagan aspirations and ideals—too lightly thrust aside; by scrupulous honesty and candid appreciation of the true value of men and of arguments hostile to us, that solid good can be effected and Catholicity regain the universality of acceptance in the civilised world and by men of light and leading, which it once enjoyed.

For the fulfilment of his ideal of Catholicity Dr. Mivart must not look to the Roman Church. The answer of Cardinal Vaughan is unmistakable—he has issued a letter to the clergy of the diocese of Westminster, in which he informs them that the recreant scientist is forbidden the Sacrament until he has given assurance of his orthodoxy, which is brought gravely under suspicion by his magazine articles, and yet more by his repeated refusal to sign a submission and profession of faith which concludes as follows:—

Moreover, I condemn and revoke all other words and statements which in articles contributed by me to the Fortnightly Review and the Nineteenth Century, or in any other of my writings are found to be in matter of Faith or Morals contrary to the teachings of the Holy Catholic Faith according to the determination of the Apostolic See; and in all such matters I submit myself to the judgment of the said See, receiving all that it receives and condemning all that it condemns.

If there are people calling themselves Catholics, the Cardinal writes, who hold such heresies as Dr. Mivart recounts, they are not Catholics at all, and if they were to approach the Sacraments, "they would do so sacrilegiously, at the peril of their souls, and in defiance of the law of the Church." Evidently Dr. Mivart must now choose between his religion and the Church of his adoption. Not where "Curialism" is in authority, but "where the Spirit of the Lord is," there is liberty.

A country minister writes:—"Is it too late, or is it too soon, to ask what our good friends at Leicester want us, during the Conference week, to do with our wives? Nothing is said about them in the paper in which we are to say whether we are going to the Conference meetings, and whether we should like a friend to put us up. And yet, with some of us, it will all turn upon the question whether our wives are to be invited too. We want to have our deacon or delegate there, of course; he is a most excellent fellow; but, since the last Conference, say, our wives have done for our church and school a hundred times as much steady, faithful, self-denying work as he has; and they deserve the interlude and refreshment of our triennial feast of reason and flow of soul as well as we ministers ourselves do. For Wendell Holmes's counsel to a young minister—to take to himself a wife, most of us have followed; and we have found his assurance made good: our hands have been upheld by Aaron (the afore-mentioned deacon) and her. And so I say: it will just make all the difference for us, whether she is to be with us or not. How can we answer Question No. 1 until we know? "Put down her name as delegate, and then she will be sure of an invitation." With all respect, that is hardly the way of it. "Difficulties!" Plenty of them. I know all about them, for at former Conferences I have been host as well as guest. But the worst difficulty of all will be to have our men, at Leicester, feeling as though they had lost their right hands. You see, sir, I am in entire ignorance of what our good friends at Leicester are proposing for us. To entertain at Conference time means hard work and plenty of it, and I have the most cordial respect and gratitude for those who take it in hand. I only want that they should realise how some of us feel about the matter I speak of, and what it means to our wives and to ourselves also."

The Seed-Sower for the current month, among other good things, contains the first of a series of articles by the Rev. E. P. Barrow on "Types of Service. I.—The Soldier," and the first of a series on Social Questions by the Editor, the Rev. Joseph Wood, the subject being "The Poor Law." There is also the second part of a Biographical Address, by the late Dr. Sadler, on "Jeremy Taylor," and a paper by Miss A. J. Lawrence on "Patience in our Work." In its extended form as the Essex Church Calendar we find also the conclusion of the story of Theophilus Lindsey's life, as a chapter in the history of Essex Church, with portraits of Dr. Toulmin and Dr. Kippis.

To halls of heavenly truth, admission wouldst thou win
Oft knowledge stands without, while love may enter in.

God many a spiritual house has reared, but never one
Where lowliness was not laid first the corner stone.

Rear highly as thou wilt thy branches in the air,
But that thy roots shall strike as deep have care. —R. C. Trench.

LONDON BAZAAR FUND.

"Midsummer Night's Dream."

On Tuesday week an excellent matinée performance of A Midsummer Night's Dream was given at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, which was kindly lent by Mr. J. H. Leigh, the lessee. The performers included a few professionals, but the greater number were amateurs connected with our London congregations. The dressing and mounting had been very carefully attended to by talented friends, and thanks to much patient study and rehearsal the play went with a smoothness which would have done credit to any dramatic company. The Era and other critics have fully endorsed the favourable opinions expressed by expert friends in the audience, which was very large and representative, and appreciated cordially the efforts of the actors. Where so many did so well it is difficult to single out names for special mention; but Mrs. Leigh as Puck, Mr. Herbert Lawford as Bottom, Mr. Benson Lawford as Quince, and Mr. A. E. Johnson as Wall, won particular commendation; while the singers and fairies were also conspicuously good, and the dances and grouping were very pleasing and effective. Mr. Leigh's generosity and able supervision of the piece call for warm recognition, and the stage manager (Mr. Watson) must be heartily congratulated on the results of his indefatigable labours with a company for the most part entirely strange to him and to the stage. Mr. Herbert Lawford, who had to double the parts of actor and manager, must have toiled immensely with his two-fold task, and to him a great share of credit and gratitude is due. The financial results appear to have been as gratifying as the performance was pleasing. We are not yet able to announce the figures, but the profit to the bazaar fund will certainly be very handsome.

Unitarian Conference, Boston, U.S.A., May, 1900.—The programme of the International Conference of Unitarians to be held in the spring at Boston, Mass., will begin, as at present outlined, with services in all the churches in the neighbourhood of Boston on Sunday, May 20; the meetings will be continued throughout the week, and will close on Friday evening, May 25. The secretary of the American Unitarian Association, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, states that representative Unitarians from different parts of the world will be present, including France, Holland, Hungary, and Japan. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be represented by the secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds. It is expected that the Sunday-school Association will be represented by the hon. secretary, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and Miss Marian Pritchard. The Hospitality Committee at Boston hope that a number of English Unitarians will make this the opportunity for seeing something of America, its life, and institutions. Further particulars will be published in due course, giving details of the order of proceedings.

Several letters from correspondents and other matter is held over until next week.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE hundred and fourteenth annual meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 18. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. David Ainsworth, and there were also present the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and Charles Hargrove (visitors), J. Estlin Carpenter (Hibbert lecturer), C. T. Poynting, P. M. Higginson, Dendy Agate, C. J. Street, H. S. Tayler, Priestley Prime, R. T. Herford, H. Gow, W. H. Drummond, A. W. Fox, T. B. Evans, and V. D. Davis; Messrs. Charles W. Jones (treasurer), R. D. Darbishire, J. H. Brooks, J. H. Nicholson, Henry Lupton, S. B. Worthington, W. Long, G. H. Leigh, F. Taylor, A. Nicholson, F. Nicholson, T. Worthington, P. S. Worthington, A. E. Steinthal; the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson and Mr. A. H. Worthington (secretaries), and Mr. E. W. Marshall (assistant secretary).

Letters of regret for inability to be present were reported from Dr. Drummond (Principal), the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and L. P. Jacks; Messrs. J. R. Beard, Russell Scott and Harry Rawson.

The President then called upon the Rev. H. E. Dowson to read the following memorial resolution:—

That the trustees of Manchester College, assembled in their annual meeting, record their profound sense of the loss they have sustained in the death of the Rev. James Martineau, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., D.Litt., the senior student of the College, entering its classrooms in 1822, and in 1839, on becoming its secretary, commencing a career of service of his alma mater as devoted as it was brilliant, and shedding upon it the unrivalled lustre that shone from his splendid genius and noble character. That the trustees bear their grateful testimony of affectionate reverence to the great teacher who, summoned from the humbler task of the secretaryship, became in 1840 professor of mental and moral philosophy; adding in 1857 religious philosophy to the subjects of his chair; succeeding in 1869 his beloved and revered friend and colleague the Rev. J. J. Tayler in the Principalship; retiring in 1875 from his professorship after unexampled services for thirty-six years, relinquishing in 1885 his Principalship, and so concluding labours on the College staff lasting for a period of forty-six years, well-nigh half a century, during which he had accumulated materials for works which made his name illustrious and exerted an influence on the religion and philosophy of his age that will for ever be one of the proudest recollections of the College; passing in the following year (1886) to the Presidential chair and conferring upon it new honour; and in 1889 taking up his last office in the College, that of the Vice-Presidency, which he held at his death in 1900, thus closing a connection with the College of unexampled length and brilliancy, opened in 1822, when as a student he first crossed its threshhold, and only ended when, after seventy-eight strenuous years had passed over his head, he entered into the eternal peace. That the trustees bear their reverent testimony to the memory of the great man who in the ninety-fifth year of a life of untiring devotion of his exalted powers to the sacred cause of truth, liberty, and religion has been called home by the Heavenly Father in whom he had so sure a trust; that they pay their tribute of affectionate homage to the religious leader, to the devoted minister of Christ now taken from their head, to his commanding intellect, to his philosophic gifts, to his fearless outlook to the truth of God, to his broad spirit of charity, to his noble unsectarianism, to his profound faith, rooted deep in the human soul, to his own personal religion, pure and undefiled, and to the moral elevation of his character. That the trustees hold it to be an enduring honour to the College that in him a voice has gone out from their walls clothed in language of incomparable power and beauty, to be heard throughout the world, and to bear the strongest witness in a materialistic and utilitarian age to the Great Spirit from whom all things proceed and whose will, making its voice heard in the human conscience, gives the Divine sanction to the moral law. That the trustees desire to convey to Dr. Martineau's family their most affectionate sympathy in the sorrow that has befallen them in the two-fold loss of their beloved father and of their sister Mrs. Lewis.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the resolution, said that it was difficult to add anything to the words in which it was drawn. Most of those present had been connected with Dr. Martineau in various ways, either as intimate friends or as students in the College. He himself had the happiest recollections, having had Dr. Martineau's eldest son as his first and most revered tutor, and having thus been brought into friendliest relations with the family. Dr. Martineau's greatness increased with his years, and in years to come his power would be still more fully and highly appreciated.

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE said that he was honoured in being called upon to second the resolution. His acquaintance with Dr. Martineau began when as a young student he spent vacations with him in 1842 and 1843. From that time he always had in Dr. Martineau a confidential adviser in many difficulties. It had been a pleasure to serve under his direction. Mr. Darbishire then recalled a mission the College committee had laid upon him, to go to Liverpool, to persuade Dr. Martineau to remove to London in 1857, and the meeting of Trustees in Cross-street Chapel in that year, at which the strong opposition to Dr. Martineau's appointment had been defeated. It was no light thing they asked of their best men, in taking them from their congregations and from public life into the seclusion of the College. To such service no one had dedicated powers greater or labours more faithful than James Martineau.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL spoke of the grateful remembrance Dr. Martineau's students had of his powers of sympathy shown to them in trying times, and of the help he gave not only in the lecture room, but in private with his wonderful power of understanding and removing their difficulties. It had been their great privilege in that College to have a teacher who had influenced the world, who held a position among religious teachers given to very few. He had stood as a barrier against the materialism and utilitarianism of the age, and won the grateful thanks of men of all the Churches. Although so strong an intellect, he was gentle and loving towards all that was weak and frail. He was quick to feel for the sufferings of the very weakest, and exemplified one of the truths Goethe laid down—that the essential point of Christianity was its sympathy for the weak and suffering. Dr. Martineau had often strengthened those who were combating in unpopular causes by giving his great influence to their endeavours, and sustaining them in their protests against moral iniquity. It was rare indeed that a man should during his own life-time be able to influence the life and conduct of three generations, yet so it had been with Dr. Martineau; and when they thought of what his influence would be over the life of generations to come they must bless God for having given them so great a teacher and so pure a mind as his.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER said that everyone familiar with Dr. Martineau's writings knew that between the first of his more important publications, the "Rationale of Religious Enquiry," and the last great treatise on the "Seat of Authority in Religion," which summed up his maturest views, there were wide differences of philosophical and theological belief. Yet during the whole time, through vicissitudes, numerous and profound, which he had himself enabled them to trace by the autobiographical sketches in the prefaces to his books, Dr. Martineau was able to retain his position in connection with the College, to bestow those splendid services, and to feel continuous loyalty and love for its foundation principles. That was possible, because he found in the College itself, deep seated in its constitution, that profound trust which he himself entertained, in the permanence and imperishableness of religion, whilst its forms of thought were continuously open to progressive change. In no other college that he knew of in England would that have been possible. Dr. Darbishire had reminded them of a meeting in Cross-street Chapel; he would venture to set beside that a reference to Dr. Martineau's last public appearance in connection with the College, at the opening at Oxford, when he was the object of so much affectionate reverence from teachers far beyond the range of their own immediate circle. What was it that secured for him the welcome of men so various as those representing the Oxford Schools? Again the same conviction, the same deep trust in the unity of religion underlying all its separate forms, and constituting a permanent bond between Churches of the most widely different types. That was what they first learnt from him, when they went to college, to trust the life of God in the soul of man, to interpret the world as the perpetual scene of the Divine presence, to trust the faculties of man, reason, conscience and affection, as organs of the revelations of His Spirit. At a time when the old authorities of Church and Bible were crumbling away, they learnt from Dr. Martineau where to rest with absolute security for the foundations of their religious life, and where to look for the means of reconstruction in the future, towards which he made such important and lasting contributions.

The first impression they received on entering college was, he thought, of the extraordinary range and exactitude of Dr. Martineau's knowledge, a mastery which could have been gained only by persistent industry; and that again they learnt from him. Then as they entered more fully into the sweep of his thought, they were carried away by the splendour of its range, the confidence with which he opened new reaches of speculation and led them forward with undaunted tread. But no one was ever more ready to own to changes of view, or was more open to fresh aspects of a subject. Thus while he taught them to trust their faculties, they learnt also not to trust any judgment as final, but always to regard the forms of interpretation of the world and human nature and life as necessarily open to fresh light and truth. Referring to Mr. Steinthal's allusion to the courage sometimes needed to approach Dr. Martineau for discussion or counsel, Mr. Carpenter said that he had heard Dr. Martineau himself say that one of the greatest difficulties of his life had been a besetting shyness. And it was true that sometimes the depth of his feeling, the intensity of his affection, set a seal on his speech. But to anyone who would break through that reserve, and boldly go to him for counsel or sympathy, it was impossible to conceive a more tender comprehension, a more penetrating wisdom, a more inspiring guidance than was vouchsafed to one on such an occasion. So also in his letters he was able to pour forth guidance and aid of the most varied kind. The perfect finish with which everything was done, even to the shortest note, sprang again from that concentration and balance of powers which made his character so deeply impressive. Deeply as they were indebted to him for modes of thought, for help in intellectual difficulty, for guidance through great problems, he was disposed to think that those who came most intimately into contact with Dr. Martineau owed him most for the extraordinary influence of his personality, the elevation of his character, and the inspiring power with which he sent them forward to every duty. That was the finest outcome of the teacher's life. Great as were his teachings, they knew that he was greater still; there was no chasm between his word and his life. All that he said in lecture or in pulpit was the outcome of the greatness of his soul.

It was the glory of that College that for so many years he had been connected with it, as student, secretary, teacher, principal, president. His departure left on them a grave responsibility—a responsibility which they had indeed felt while he still lived, but must more deeply feel now that he was gone. They could not wish to keep him longer, even in an old age so deeply reverenced, for infirmity had already laid its hand upon him; rather must they think, think with a joyous hope, of the new light that had broken upon him as he went forward into the eternal peace.

The resolution was passed, the Trustees standing in reverent silence.

The Annual Address of the Committee, which together with the accounts had been previously printed and circulated, recorded the losses sustained by the College during the past year through the death of many supporters, including Sir Henry Tate, Bart., Mr. Arthur Greg, Miss Anna Swanwick, Mrs. T. Smith Osler, Mr. Benjamin Heape, and the Rev. Thomas Hincks. The deficiency on the year's income amounted to £190 10s. 7d., making the gross deficiency £864 2s. 4d. The retirement of Mr. Carpenter last June, and his appointment as Hibbert lecturer on "The Comparative Study of Religions" was recorded, and the extension of that appointment for a term of six years from June, 1900, while the Hibbert Trustees had also acceded to the request of the Committee to renew for another six years the appointment of the Rev. J. E. Odgers as lecturer on Ecclesiastical History. The Rev. W. E. Addis had entered on his duties in the chair of Old Testament Language and Literature at the beginning of the current session, and was in residence at 27, Holywell, superintending the residence of the students in the two adjoining houses. The houses had been adopted for this purpose at a cost of £1,364 2s. 9d., of which £1,000 had been given by Mrs. George Holt and Miss Holt. It was reported that the new arrangements as to residence had given the utmost satisfaction. The session opened with nine regular divinity students, six special students, and six external students, preparing for the divinity course, four of them at Oxford. The report noted with regret that few academical distinctions had been gained, and concluded with a strong plea for the dedication of men of high culture to the ministry. It was not a good sign when a religious community did not produce its own ministry, and the hope was expressed that the new foundation of Willaston School might help to remedy that defect.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, the treasurer, in presenting the accounts, drew attention to the adverse balance, and said that the deficiency would have to be met by selling stock, reducing their capital, unless a wider interest was shown in the increase of subscriptions. The chapel account showed that the endowment fund was not sufficient, and the services were a drain upon the resources of the College. A few subscriptions from Oxford residents who attended the services had been received, but if these were not increased the only course would be to cut down the expenses, and he should be sorry if that had to be done. Remembering the great interest the late Mr. George Holt had taken in the residence scheme, the Committee had devoted to that purpose the £500 given by Mrs. and Miss Holt in memory of him, and they had subsequently given a further £500, thus meeting the greater part of the cost of adapting the Holywell houses for the residence.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the address and accounts, said that if their supporters realised the present high state of efficiency of the College, and the unusually large number of students, he did not think they would allow the deficit to remain. He expressed special satisfaction at the success of the summer extension lectures, by which their influence was brought to bear on the outside public, in a way not open to the College before. The appointments of the two Hibbert Lecturers, and of Mr. Addis to his chair and as head of the new residence, were subjects for the utmost satisfaction. He hoped much from Willaston School, as providing healthy physical and intellectual training, to furnish the right kind of students for the College.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. C. T. POYNTING, and after remarks from the Revs. C. J. STREET, and DENDY AGATE, and Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, was adopted.

Mr. DARBISHIRE urged that ministers should appeal directly to the laymen, to encourage their sons to enter the ministry, and set that before them as a noble sacrifice of life and power.

On the motion of Mr. W. Long, seconded by Mr. J. H. Brooks, Mr. W. Colfox was elected President. As vice-presidents, Mr. David Ainsworth, Mr. J. Arlosh, and Mr. Harry Rawson were elected. The Committee was re-appointed, with Mr. G. H. Leigh as a new member. Mr. A. E. Steinthal and Mr. Richard D. Holt were appointed auditors. The treasurer and secretaries were re-appointed, with warm expressions of gratitude for their services. A cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Ainsworth for his services as President brought the meeting to a close.

AT a meeting of the Committee of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, held on Jan. 22, 1900, the following resolution, proposed by Mr. Walter Holland (the President), and seconded by the Rev. Dr. L. de Beaumont Klein, was adopted:—

That the Committee of the Liverpool Domestic Mission Society hereby record their sense of the profound loss sustained in the death of the Rev. James Martineau, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., D.Litt. They reflect that it was largely under the inspiration of his enthusiasm, in conjunction with the late Rev. John Hamilton Thom, that the Domestic Mission was founded, and that through the sixty-four years of its existence it has enjoyed his continued sympathy and its principles have met with his steadfast and enlightened support. With him passes away the last survivor of those who met together and took part at the meeting held in Renshaw-street Chapel on Good Friday, April 1, 1836, when the constitution of the Society was established. They gratefully acknowledge that the splendour of his intellectual powers and his incomparable achievements in the loftiest realms of abstract thought have ever been accompanied by the tenderest sympathy with human suffering and an unfailing solicitude for the spread of the Kingdom of God in the humblest homes of men.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES FOR INQUIRERS IN RELIGION.—III.

WE have been speaking of the contrast between a vague feeling or want, and the feeling whose meaning is thought out and understood. The best historical illustration is one which is very tempting to dwell upon, but also very difficult to deal with—the state of things at the time when Christianity began to spread in the world.

The belief of the earliest Christians throughout the Greek and Roman world must have been that living belief of which we have been speaking, which is an element in character and takes its place among the springs of action. Hence our thought may fail to grasp it; and doubtless for this reason not many of the first Christians could have given any sufficient intellectual account of the power which their acquaintance with the life and teachings of Jesus gave them. We must remember that it was a real power, which many of them gained for the first time. This is true, notwithstanding the numbers of "perverts," who at the first sign of persecution hastened to sacrifice in the temples of the established religion. To be Christians, men had not merely to say this or that, or go through any routine of action or form of words, for creeds and ceremonies had scarcely begun to arise; nor had they to exercise their reasoning faculties merely, for the great majority of the converts had no intellectual powers above the ordinary level, and were not drawn from the classes who were mentally cultivated; but in order to be Christians and maintain their faith, they had to possess in a high degree that almost indefinable quality which we call strength or force of character, and their hardships and sufferings served to call this forth.

In order to understand why this simple doctrine came to them almost as a new life, let us try to realise the kind of world in which the first apostles of Christianity went forth. We shall best do this by contrasting it with the classical Greek world—as it was at its best—the Greece which we are thinking of when we speak of Greek architecture, sculpture, or literature. "Greece" was not one, but many States, embracing a number of independent commonwealths. Now, in such a commonwealth, the majority of the "citizens"—that is, of those who had civic rights—could satisfy themselves by the place and function which they found in its affairs; and they could find guidance for their lives in its laws and customs. And when all the citizens were able to meet together in a general congress to hear the affairs of the State discussed, "public life" meant much more for them than it can ever mean for us; and the part which the citizen took in it gave free play to his best desires and needs. Instinctively he would act on the two characteristic Greek maxims which may be rendered—"learn thine own powers" and "carry none to excess." The Greek delighted in the beauty and brightness and joy of this world; he sought to make life a harmony of the soul and the body, each life being only one note in a wider harmony of many different lives. As long as the Greek spirit sought instinctively to express itself thus, the great problem of the duty and destiny of the individual man, or the "salvation of the soul," could hardly arise. Philosophy pondered its problems and sought to understand things, but this was just for the sake of understanding them, and not expressly "for all men's good," which Epicurus afterwards supposed to be the chief aim of philosophic thought. On the contrary, it was pure scientific speculation, dealing with such subjects as the basis of certainty, the laws of thought, the laws of Nature, the meaning of the world. Thus the spirit of the community expressed itself, practically, in making human life free and beautiful, and yet reasonable; and theoretically, in an intellectual interpretation of this life which was complete enough to prevent any serious discord between the speculations of the greatest thinkers and the general feeling of the time.

In a few generations more, this harmony, both on its theoretical and practical sides, was destined to be utterly broken up, and all its elements scattered abroad like dust; and the causes of this were partly external, partly internal. Turning our attention first to the latter, we notice that the free harmonious social life had in itself defects and limitations which prepared the way for its approaching fate. We observe that it was limited to the one community. The Greek could not conceive it as realised otherwise than in a small self-contained commonwealth like the one in which he lived. We observe also that even within the single State the highest life was attainable only by citizens who had leisure, and the means and opportunity of self-cultivation. The multitude of slaves, menials, and dependents had no share in it at all; and they formed the larger part of the population. Indeed, if we include these in our idea of the community, then such a State as Athens, for example, the most enlightened of Greek States, deserves to be called an "oligarchy" rather than a "republic." We observe, finally, that the Ideal itself, the Greek conception of the highest life as it was theoretically expressed by the philosophers, was defective. It was a combination of two ideals, an intellectual and a moral; and there is a significant difference in the places assigned to them, which may be illustrated well by reference to the teaching of Aristotle. First was placed the Ideal of Truth or the rational comprehension of things, the Ideal of man's intellectual consciousness as such. This is made of supreme worth; the life of ordinary virtue has value only as facilitating the development of Reason.

In Professor William Wallace's words, the Divine Life for Aristotle is a "life of mental self-realisation, of philosophical truth-seeking and truth-seeing, ever successful, yet perennially interesting; justice and virtue, holiness and mercy, have no meaning here." This intellectual Ideal is one which a man can pursue for himself alone; it is "individualistic" in the modern sense of the word. The moral Ideal, as we have seen, could hardly be thought of by the Greek as being other than social. Plato and Aristotle are as emphatic as St. Paul in teaching that we are members one of another, that man cannot live to himself alone. Yet the idea of applying this, outside the limits of the State, was far from their thought; and within, it had little effect on the moral and religious imagination of the common people.

Bearing in mind these defects in the Greek Ideal of life, we can see the meaning of the great political changes that were to come. The conquest of the small Greek states by the Macedonian kings broke up the exclusive feeling which each community had possessed before; then, the conquest of the powerful Persian empire by the Macedonian Alexander the Great brought Greece under one government with the East; and, finally, the increasing conquests of the Roman power brought Greece and the East under one government with the West. The Greek city-states were dissipated, so to speak, as the rock-ponds are by the rising tide. The bonds which had held the citizen to the small environment of his own commonwealth were cut through, and he was transplanted into an environment indefinitely wide. The old willing, self-satisfying interest in public life could no longer exist. The new means of travel and intercourse between different lands broke up old associations and weakened patriotic ties. Man had somehow to make himself, not a citizen of a State whose territory covered a few square miles, but a citizen of the world. It could not be done. There was nothing to replace the lost feeling of brotherhood, of unity and mutual responsibility, which had prevailed among all who "counted for something" in the life of the State; while the condition of the populace remained as before, or grew worse.

The most striking sign of the times was not the immorality and brutality which existed in parts of the Roman Empire, and of which we read so much; for, terrible as this was, there were already forces at work tending to destroy it. What was most characteristic of the age was the breaking up of old bonds of connection which had held men together. Hence the deepest need of the age was a conception of the Divine Kingdom which would be of universal application, making it a kingdom in which each and all might have a portion. In other words, there was needed a theoretical and practical recognition of the individual man as such, which would at the same time allow him to express his will in free harmony with his fellow-men. What, then, was the intellectual development of the age, and how far did it understand this need? Look first at its theoretical teaching. Plato had laid stress on the greatness of the difference between the ideal or divine world, where eternal Truth and Beauty dwell, and the world of things that we can touch and see; and on the greatness of the difference between the highest rational life and the life of emotion and passion. Aristotle, his successor, made the highest life one of pure intellectual activity. In the period which followed, this "intellectualist" tendency grew stronger still. The highest or purely rational life became something divine which was more and more removed from the natural life of this world, and at length was opposed to the world in its very nature; so that men could not reach anything divine and holy, anything in which their spirits could rest, except by forsaking all the interests which make up this earthly life of ours. Similarly, on its practical side, the mind of the age made the isolation of individuals more sharply felt. Profoundly dissatisfied with the actual world, men tried in Stoicism and kindred systems to escape from it by withdrawing wholly into themselves: "Abstain and endure; be not dependent for thy happiness on the accidents of the surrounding world—be sufficient for thyself"! This relentless resignation was only an expression of defeat.

Thus, when men needed above all things to be brought nearer to one another and nearer to divine realities, the mind of the age emphasised their isolation and separation in both respects. There was no great prophetic or scientific genius for three centuries after the death of Aristotle—no one with insight enough to tell the age what all its restless distracted feeling meant. This is the supreme instance which history affords, of the human mind not only being ignorant of its own deepest needs, but conceiving them to be the opposite of what they really were. There is no need to dwell on the way in which primitive Christianity brought forth an idea of the Kingdom of Heaven which was equal to universalising the righteousness which Plato taught, making it a life in which all could share; and the way in which it brought men nigh unto God by finding that the divinest life had verily been lived on this earth.

The meaning of our principle must now surely be evident, whether it is applied to the single life or to the life of the age. Self-knowledge, in every direction of it, has and must have degrees of truth. It attains truth by rationalising or interpreting the facts of immediate experience, which are always real, but may be so tumultuous as to entail disastrous consequences, if the intellect is not sufficiently developed to be capable of giving them adequate form or expression.

S. H. MELLONE.

HUMAN beings put faith in human beings. This is true, and do human beings dare to doubt their God? Every trial is over, oh brother, oh sister, when the gentle angels have lifted the cover of our darkness and looked in with the sunshine. Under the heavy folds of humanity, God looks in and says, "Trust me, my children, only trust, and all will be well."—Rev W. H. Channing.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. D. D. JEREMY, M.A.

THE Rev. Daniel Davies Jeremy, whose death is announced in another column, was the youngest son of the Rev. John Jeremy, of Caeronen, and was born Aug. 31, 1828, at Cwmbedw, in the parish of Pencarreg, Carmarthenshire. His father having removed to Carmarthen in 1837 for the purpose of educating his children, he became a pupil at the Grammar School conducted by the Rev. [Dr.] Lloyd, and in June, 1844, was admitted to the Presbyterian College as a student for the ministry. After completing a course of four years at this institution, he entered the University of Glasgow as a Dr. Williams' scholar, graduating M.A. three years later with honours in Classics and Philosophy.

On leaving Glasgow he became private tutor to the sons of Mr. Henry Dowson, at Geldestone (Norfolk), in succession to his brother, W. D. Jeremy, afterwards officiating on supply at Taunton, Bridgewater, Royston, Northampton, and other places until the end of 1851, when he became minister, for some fifteen months, of the Unitarian congregation at Frenchay, near Bristol. His next pastoral charge—after a short interval employed in private tuition at Bocking—was Warwick, to which, in the course of a few months, was added Kenilworth. These congregations he served conjointly for nearly seven years, preaching regularly three times a Sunday, the Kenilworth service being in the afternoon.

In September, 1860, he removed to Dublin in response to an invitation from the Eustace-street Church, and was there ordained according to Presbyterian usage. When the congregation amalgamated with that of Stephen's-green in 1869, he became co-pastor of the united society, in association with the Rev. G. A. Armstrong. Here he ministered—with the exception of some twelve months in 1878-9 during which he was invalided—until Jan. 1, 1891, when, owing to failing health, he retired from the active duties of his office. Since the death of his colleague in 1889 he had been sole pastor.

The remaining years of his life were spent in Italy, London, and Weybridge, in such gentle occupations as his strength allowed. Death, as revealed by an autopsy undertaken at his own request, was due to long-standing disease of the heart. He was buried at Highgate cemetery on Tuesday, the 23rd, when the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, in the absence of the Rev. Dr. Herford, conducted the last rites.

Mr. Jeremy had been hampered from childhood with a delicate constitution, which precluded sustained effort at all times, and seriously limited his energies. For this reason he seldom took part in public movements; and he was, perhaps, less known to the Unitarian world than any minister of his ability and standing. To the congregations which he served, his pulpit ministrations, thoughtful and cultured as they always were, afforded unmixed satisfaction, as evidenced by several testimonials presented to him from time to time. In other relations his amiable qualities had endeared him to a large circle of friends, his natural kindliness and geniality conciliating the goodwill of all who approached him.

During the forty years of his ministry his theological views had undergone a considerable change. Nurtured in the older Unitarianism, he had gradually outgrown many of his early convictions, and during at least his latter years he was in full sympathy with the new school. But he was not given to theological controversy, and as he advanced in life believed less and less in its efficacy. His final attitude may be gathered from a beautiful utterance of John Wesley's, which he applies with evident approbation to his father in a Welsh biography of the latter lately contributed to the Ymofynydd:—

We may die without the knowledge of many truths and yet be received into Abraham's bosom, but if we die without love, what will knowledge avail? Just as much as it avails the devil and his angels. I will not quarrel with you about any opinion, only see that your heart be right towards God—that you know and love the Lord Jesus Christ, that you love your neighbour and walk as your Master walked, and I desire no more. I am sick of opinions. . . . Give me solid and substantial Religion, give me an humble, gentle lover of God and man—a man full of mercy and good faith without partiality and without hypocrisy—a man laying himself out in the work of faith, the patience of hope and the labour of love. Let my soul be with those Christians wheresoever they are and whatsoever opinion they are of. "Whosoever" thus "doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother."

Mr. Jeremy's wife, who survives him, was the daughter of Edward Hutton, M.D., of Merrion-square, Dublin. Two sons and two daughters were the issue of the marriage.

THE REV. DAVID THOMPSON.

WE regret to announce the death of the Rev. David Thompson, of Dromore, co. Down, which occurred at the Manse, on Wednesday, Jan. 17. He had been for some years in feeble health, but had continued to fulfil the duties of his office as strength permitted. His death will be mourned by a very wide circle of friends in Ulster, and by the whole population of Dromore, irrespective of creed or party. He passed through a public life in the enjoyment of universal respect and esteem, without making, it may be said, a single personal enemy. His nature was kindness itself. He ever manifested a tender consideration for the rights and feelings of others. That his sweet Christian disposition was a force that moved to friendship and toleration has often been exemplified in many ways. During the recent and during a previous illness ministers of other denominations have filled his pulpit and undertaken pastoral duty for him with great acceptance to his congregation, and with the approval of all, thus testifying to the spiritual fellowship and harmony that underlies and unites all the branches of the Church of Christ.

Mr. Thompson was a native of the Moneyrea district, and was brought up in connection with the Moneyrea congregation. As a youth he spent some time in the office and on the reporting staff of the News Letter, Belfast. Afterwards he studied at the Unitarian Home Missionary College in Manchester, and after a temporary settlement at Sale, was ordained minister at Moneyrea in 1865, where, during a ten years' pastorate, he enjoyed the highest regard of his people. On the formation of the Mountpottinger Unitarian Church in 1875 he became its minister. Here his ministration of the Gospel proved highly acceptable. Toward the end of his Mountpottinger pastorate he was chosen to fill the position of president of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and Other Free Christians. But it was on his removal to Dromore in 1879 that he found his share in the ministry that proved to be more particularly his life's work. Here he ministered for over twenty years to a large, united, and appreciative flock, who reverenced him for his gentle and saintly character, which he carried into all his relationships, earning the universal affection and regard of which so much evidence has been given.

The funeral took place on Saturday last, a religious service being conducted at the Manse by the Revs. R. J. Orr and Joseph Pollard, while at the church the officiating ministers were the Revs. A. B. Hamilton, R. Lyttle, and J. Kennedy. Mr. Lyttle delivered an address, in which he paid a reverent and affectionate tribute to the character of his friend.

MRS. GEORGE WEBSTER.

A SERIOUS loss has been sustained by the Wakefield congregation through the death of one of its most esteemed and devoted members, the wife of Mr. George Webster, J.P., the acting trustee of Westgate Chapel. In this brief memorial, only a few details can be given of her uneventful but beneficent life, which has closed in middle age. Descended from a staunch Nonconformist family, she inherited their steadfastness of principle and added to it a gentle refinement, a calm and sweet disposition, and a constant readiness to share the burdens of others. Although for years past her health was often broken, her strength of heart and her fortitude never failed, and no good cause lacked her sympathy and support. She was exceedingly helpful in the activities of the congregation, and many outside its limits were blessed by her untiring efforts to relieve those in sorrowful conditions. What she was in her own home circle and how much she will be missed and mourned cannot be told. The memory of her life and work will long linger amongst those who knew her, and it was with affection and gratitude that she was laid to rest near the venerable place of worship to which she had rendered such manifold and valuable services.

The Inward Witness of God.

"WHERE is your God?" they say:
Answer them, Lord most Holy!
Reveal Thy secret way
Of visiting the lowly:
Not wrapped in moving cloud,
Or nightly-resting fire;
But veiled within the shroud
Of silent high desire.

Come not in flashing storm,
Of bursting frown of thunder:
Come in the viewless form
Of wakening love and wonder—
Of duty grown divine,
The restless spirit, still;
Of sorrows taught to shine,
As shadows of Thy will.

O God! the pure alone—
E'en in their deep confessing,
Can see Thee as their own,
And find the perfect blessing;
Yet to each waiting soul
Speak in Thy still small voice,
Till broken love's made whole,
And saddened hearts rejoice.

JAMES MARTINEAU.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Martineau's "Hours of Thought."

NATURE is only his fabric, and is not like him; Man is his child, and is susceptible of his image. The human characteristics must for ever stand with us as, out of all that we can think, the very likest to him; and these are not a perpetual and unrelenting mechanism; but the thinking Reason, the aspiring Conscience, the elective Will, the gentle and self-sacrificing Affection. And when these speak to our hearts as his witnesses, we have our eye upon a more intermittent as well as a higher glory, than can be found in the great physical laws: for, as the Spirit bloweth where it listeth, the life of men and angels has at once a freer and diviner movement than the travels of a sunbeam or the revolution of a star. Nor is it in all men, or in the whole of human history, that it is given us to trace the impress of his Mind. However true it is that there is no private heart to which he is quite strange, yet it is not in all alike that the sanctities of his agency visibly appear. We see and own him in proportion to the nobleness and beauty of the lives which he inspires; and it is only now and then, at the great crises of society, that the common level of the human self and the finite understanding is transcended, and sages, prophets, saints rise above their nature and become the organs of a Spirit not their own. I presume not to say how it is God takes up his abode with us; where, across the melting colours the precise line should be drawn that divides the human from the divine. But wherever he so dwells with the soul as to impart his own character, and lift before our eye the beauty of holiness, it is his supreme expression, as it is his rarest. Accordingly it is this which he selects for the supernatural revelation of himself which stands unique,—"the Word made flesh,"—the divine life humanised, and the human glorified,—the blending of both in communion and reconciliation. In that sacrifice culminate the intermittent visitations of God: it was not tidal only: it is once for all; and as it was supreme, it was solitary too. As all the special goodness, grace, and truth of historic men give pauses of blessed rest, and are not the week-day, but the sabbath of the world; so is the divine perfectness of Christ the sabbath of sabbaths, the solemn jubilee of our humanity.

Be assured then that in your ancient usages of seasonal and local worship, in seeking here to meet at intervals the high tides of God's spirit, you are in harmony with his sublimest Providence,—with a law of variation transcending any physical uniformity over which it sweeps. Reverence the holy custom, shelter from heedless slight the living impulse, that week by week calls you hither to remember, to aspire, to pray. Bring only the pure, lowly, childlike heart, tender to everything except the sins you must confess,—full of hope for the world and trust in God; spread out an eager and a gentle spirit for the dropping of fruitful seeds from Holy Writ and saintly hymn; freshen the fading vow of self-sacrificing love; and your worship here will not only resemble his who, in fulness of the Spirit, "went, as his custom was, into the synagogue on the sabbath day," but prepare for a higher communion, where "your life is hid with him in God."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Thy Kingdom Come.

I SAID, when I began to speak to you about the Lord's Prayer, that all the other sentences of the prayer grow out of the one thought of God as our Father. When we remember what He is to us, with His great love and holiness, at once the earnest wish comes to us that we may keep His name sacred, and both in our words and lives show how much we reverence Him; and so we pray, "Hallowed be Thy Name." Then, just as naturally, comes the wish that all the world may show that same reverence to God, and be obedient to the law of goodness, which we know to be His will; so the next prayer follows: "Thy Kingdom come."

For that is what the Kingdom means. It is just this world, or any other world where the children of God are, ordered as He would have it, with truth and righteousness, gentleness, unselfishness, and loving-kindness, just as in a good home where all are obedient to the father and trust in his love and constant care.

When Jesus was a boy, and was taught by his father and mother, and at school, about God and goodness, they often spoke of the Kingdom, or the Kingdom of God, and one old teacher belonging to his people used to say that no prayer was complete in which there was no mention of the Kingdom. So when Jesus himself began to teach he took up this thought of the Kingdom, and remembered it in his prayer. He knew how much there was in the world that was wrong and sorrowful, and he knew that it ought not to be so. His teaching was to make men better and to make the world better. By making men feel that God is their Father, and they must live as His children in the world, he knew that he should give them the best help, and that the Kingdom would most quickly come in that way.

And that is what really happened. You remember the story he told about the Good Samaritan. If everyone was kind and compassionate, and brave in times of danger, and willing to help like that man, the world would be much more like God's Kingdom than it is; and it is already much more like it, than it would have been if no one had learnt from Jesus how to live as good neighbours and friends, and as loving brothers, trusting in the same heavenly Father.

People who are Christians, that is, followers of Jesus, have done a great deal to make the world better. In the early days, after he had first taught men a better way, there was a great deal of cruelty, and in the city of Rome it was a common thing to have shows, like an enormous circus, in which savage beasts and men fought together, and men were even made to fight and kill one another, just to amuse the people. In the days when the Christians were persecuted, they were often brought to be torn in pieces by the wild beasts, and in that way many martyrs suffered death. But even after the Emperor had accepted the Christian faith and the people were supposed to be all Christians, though there was no more persecution, those cruel sports and the fights of the gladiators were not at once given up. Then one faithful man felt the wickedness of it, and he prayed the prayer, "Thy Kingdom come," in such a way that the people were put to shame, and those cruel and disgraceful shows were never held again. He was a poor old man, who had come from the country, where he lived the life of a hermit, to spend Christmas in Rome. He saw what was done in the city, and how the people still delighted in cruelty and were eager to see bloodshed. And when one day the crowds were gathered to see a great fight of gladiators, he leapt down between the men and forbade it, as an evil and wicked thing. The people were angry, and there were passionate cries that he should be put out of the way. But he would not stir, and then the men cut him down with their swords, and the people threw great stones on him and he was killed. But he had not prayed his prayer in vain; for when the people saw that he was dead, and that he was a holy man, they were struck with horror; and after all he stopped the fighting, for from that time such cruel shows were not allowed again.

That is only one example of how a brave Christian man has helped to make the world a little more like God's Kingdom. You will be able to think of many others, of those who, by faithful patient work, and often with much patient suffering, have made an end of evil things like slavery, or have taught men to live healthier and better lives, giving up evil habits, learning to be more honest and kinder and gentler. In all such ways they joined in the prayer, "Thy Kingdom come."

Do you know the hymn, "Come, Kingdom of our God"? It was written by John Johns, who more than sixty years ago went to be minister among the poor in Liverpool, and in the year 1847 died of fever, which he caught while helping the people in a time of great distress. Those years of his ministry were a very noble prayer for the coming of the Kingdom, and it is good to remember that when we sing his hymn. So we see how much is needed to make the prayer "Thy Kingdom come" a real prayer; and whoever takes those great words on his lips must be ready to help in every way he can to make the world better, as God intends that it should be, as the home of His children.

Does it seem to you too great a thing, and that you are still too young to do anything for the Kingdom of God? You must not think so for a moment. Everyone of you can do something. Your home is part of the world, and has to be part of the Kingdom; so you must begin there. If you have been careless and untidy, and begin to keep your things in better order, and to be punctual and considerate to others, and as cheerful and helpful as you can, it may not seem to you a great thing, but it will make a great difference in your home. If you keep from little meannesses and untruth, and love to speak and act so that you need never be ashamed; if you learn to govern your temper and keep from angry words, and help others to be gentle and good-tempered; if you give up idling and throw yourself heartily into the work you have to do, whether at home or at school, in all such ways you are making for the right sort of life, which is part of the Kingdom, and though it is only as children, you are growing in the right direction, to be brave and faithful men and women, and you are learning as you ought to learn, to pray "Thy Kingdom come."

JOHN RUSKIN.

GREAT prophets, by reason of the very magnitude of their mission, are apt to despair and consider themselves as merely voices crying in the wilderness. So was it with JOHN RUSKIN, "the soul of the Age." But his voice, like that of every mighty prophet, was loud and stern enough to exert a fascinating influence that drew the multitudes into the wilderness to listen, and very largely to repent. People went back to the "desert" whence they came, sadder but wiser, and with a living hope that soon they would be happier. The prophet's message rang out in every key and tense and mood: "Be thou glad, O thirsting desert; let the desert be made cheerful, and bloom as the lily; and the barren places of Jordan shall run wild with wood." Or thus: "Get Corn laws established, dealing in a better bread; bread made of that old enchanted Arabian grain, the sesame, which opens doors—doors, not of robbers' but of Kings' treasuries." Seek first the true bread, and true wealth shall follow. "Government and co-operation are, in all things, the laws of life; anarchy and competition, the laws of death."

Few men have been the object of such amazing misinterpretations and misrepresentations as JOHN RUSKIN, and he did not always make things better by his vehement replies. Like a true prophet, RUSKIN has spared nobody from the throne to the gutter, when the Righteousness that alone exalteth a nation has been in any sphere betrayed or ignored. Few men have said such severe and true things about Royalty and Aristocracy, about Middle Classism and Democracy. Was he a Conservative, a Liberal, a Socialist? Each in turn have found something of their teaching in him, each in turn have writhed under his unsparing lash, each in turn have fiercely attacked him, each in turn are beginning to think that the best and truest and loveliest things that they believe are coming to men in the "Good Time Coming," as the fruit of their principles, are all in JOHN RUSKIN, expressed in the perfection of English speech and writing—for in this, at any rate, none contests the palm with him, the master of the purest and chastest and loveliest English of the century.

There are no doubt better times coming than we enjoy, in the mere ordering of social arrangements, in the social environment. In what respect such environment will be better will be in no small measure owing to the influence of RUSKIN on this century—owing to his denunciation throughout some forty or fifty years of what has been false, and bad, and ugly. Will commerce look more to perfecting production and aim less at profit-making and money-making? It will be owing to RUSKIN's fierce prophetic preaching. Will machinery be more and more used for the easing of labour and shortening the hours of labour, and for the drudgery work of life, releasing men for the lovely and skilful work that the hand alone can do, and which awakes interest and is rewarded with joy? It will be owing in the largest measure to RUSKIN. Will our atmosphere grow a little clearer from the oppressive fog and smoke that has hitherto made large towns into infernal regions for the workers, places from which all who could fled, for seasons at any rate, especially those who had created those abominable conditions for other men to live in? It will be owing in a large measure to RUSKIN. Will our streets cease to have such a dreary monotony of rows of ugly and wretchedly-built and inconvenient houses, without the faintest architectural or artistic pretensions, and made only to produce rent? Such a transformation is gradually coming. It is owing in the main to RUSKIN. Will our schools cease to be mere cramming establishments, and children's eyes and hands be more exercised than their brains and memories, and education be so begun that the growing youths and maidens will not afterwards shun it like a plague? That will be owing to the fierce protests of JOHN RUSKIN. Will a minimum wage, "a living wage," aye, and more than that (when men's consciences are really awake) come to be the first charge in determining the price of any of the commodities of life, so that "sweating" shall only be a hideous memory of what happened in the nineteenth century? That also will be owing to the man who, years ago, was ridiculed and abused past bearing for stating what would happen by force if not conceded by reason.

One might continue, without limit, shadowing forth the vast changes that were involved in RUSKIN's denunciations, and in his oftentimes pathetic and fascinating appeals to men to walk wisely and to make beautiful and healthy conditions for all men's lives, especially for the most hopeless and down-trodden. "The history of literature," says Mr. J. A. HOBSON, "contains no more heroic example of a single man fighting, almost alone, against the indifference of the public and the unconcealed contempt of the mass of the educated classes—openly taunted as a fanatical ignoramus by arm-chair economists . . . . bewailed by his artistic and literary friends as one who had abandoned himself to a wild and fruitless crusade; accounted a Utopian dreamer by most of his readers." No man more than RUSKIN has wakened the consciences and the interest of women so as to rouse them to become a mighty reforming force in the Nation. He did not create the New Woman, nor did he advocate the Parliamentary Woman. Both he and CARLYLE thought we had had too much already of the Parliamentary man to hope for salvation from any development in that direction. We wanted infinitely less machinery and vastly more production. He roused the women of the land to set their hands to Social Reform before it was too late, and there is no mistaking the effect of his appeal. There has been no better friend (not less good because so terribly candid) of the working classes and of the poor than RUSKIN. There has been no more valiant defender of the wronged. He spoke for Bishop COLENSO when the Church hounded him for heresy: he opposed the Manchester School of Political Economists when scarcely another dared: in the face of Professor TYNDALL he told the world who was the first to notice the action of glaciers in the Alps. He has supplied the best artillery and ammunition in the war against social evils to all the fraternity of Progressives under whatever names they are fighting. Mr. COLLINGWOOD says of him, that "though RUSKIN looks fondly back to old times for his personal ideals, his teaching is essentially modern. Its atmosphere is that of the time coming, and its ideas are those that commend themselves to the vanguard of progress—not the 'progress' of old-fashioned Liberalism, but of an age which has been born since RUSKIN's voice began to fail, and which is now beginning to realise that he is its true father and pioneer."

Years ago, when JOHN RUSKIN was making his Great Renunciation, in order to enter into battle with what he felt and saw to be the evils of the age, when he knew what the cost would be to his health, to his most valued friendships, involving even the misunderstanding of his nearest and dearest relations, his father pre-eminently, whose wealth and his own he has so lavishly spent in this great warfare, he wrote the following words, which, it seems to us, every man ought to keep steadily before him before he judges RUSKIN, most of all before he condemns him: it may be these words will put him hereafter beyond all praise of men:—"I am still very unwell," he wrote, "and tormented between the longing for rest and lovely life, and the sense of this terrific call of human crime for resistance and human misery for help, though it seems to me as the voice of a river of blood which can but sweep me down in the midst of its black clots, helpless." Much sesame has grown since then; great doors and effectual were opened unto him, and there were many adversaries: some lilies are blooming in the desert. There is deep gratitude in the land to JOHN RUSKIN.

The ache about the heart which we felt when we learnt that Dr. MARTINEAU was no more was deepened as, so soon after, followed the death of Mr. RUSKIN. Gone are the last of the great seers and teachers. Both seemed battling in an uncongenial arena. Destined, each, for superb achievement in other realms, they each seemed to take up an alien mission, a Herculean task thrust upon them in spite of the deepest reluctance to turn aside from the main path of a higher calling. This knight-errantry on behalf of mankind struggling in the clutches of Giant Despair—on the one hand rising grim in the religious world at the bidding of a pseudo-science, and, on the other hand, rising grimmer in the social world at the bidding of a pseudo-political economy—this devious knight-errantry proved to be the task of a lifetime. But by the nature of their combat could be divined the true nature of the combatants. The one was the incarnation of a sincere and adoring religion, the other the incarnation of glorious art, as the most exalted expression of sincere and adoring religion. Never was such fearless unmasking of all substitutes for the true GOD; never was such fearless unmasking of all substitutes for true art. What an age the next will be if MARTINEAU leads it in religion, and if art waits upon religion under the divine inspiration of the greatest art-prophet of his time, JOHN RUSKIN, clothing it in a garment of praise, for "All great art is praise," says the Master.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

WE are spinning our own fates, good or evil, and never to be undone. Every smallest stroke of virtue or vice leaves its never so little scar. The drunken Rip van Winkle in Jefferson's play excused himself for every fresh dereliction by saying, "I won't count this time." Well, he may not count it, and a kind heaven may not count it, but it is being counted none the less. Down among his nerve cells and fibres the molecules are counting it, registering and storing it up to be used against him when the next temptation comes. Nothing we ever do is, in strict scientific literalness, wiped out.—Professor W. James.

DR. MARTINEAU: MEMORIAL SERVICES.

AT Manchester College, Oxford, an impressive Memorial Service was held on Sunday morning, the sermon being preached by Dr. Drummond, Principal of the College. After the sermon Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar" was sung, and the service concluded with Chopin's "Funeral March."

DR. DRUMMOND'S SERMON.

"If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him."—John xiv. 23.

There are two ways in which our friend may come to us. He may come in bodily presence; and if we have discerning as well as loving hearts, that bodily presence will reveal the indwelling soul, and be a medium of spiritual communion. But it is possible that this intimate presence may conceal as much as it reveals, and outward trifles may prevent our discerning the mind within. Or he may come to us spiritually when the body has gone from our view, and the ideal man may stand before our inward apprehension, stripped of all that was transient and earthly, and disclosing for the first time to our awakened and purified sense the glory which we had only half perceived. When he comes to us thus, he abides with us, and, subject no more to the partings of our earthly lot, he dwells with us as an illuminating and quickening spirit. The most eminent illustration of this truth is to be found in the relation between Christ and his disciples. During his earthly life they were drawn to him in reverence and love, but they only half understood him. Prejudices, which could not be dissipated except by the shocks of experience, blinded their eyes; and not till he was gone did they perceive the real magnitude of him whom they had followed, and begin to apprehend him in his world-wide relations. But love is the great revealer; and to those who loved him he came as an abiding spirit, revealing the hidden meaning of his life according to the receptive capacity of each venerating heart. And still he comes, not, as was originally expected, in literal clouds, but in the soft light or stormy shadow of spiritual experience; and time is found to be no barrier to the intuitions of sympathy and love.

What is true of the great Teacher whose divine life has flung its power down the ages is true in its less degree of the disciple. It is only when life here is closed that its full significance becomes apparent, and its purely spiritual features seem to stand forth in detachment from all that was earthly and temporary, and to exhibit their permanent relations and just proportions. And yet, to a large extent, when men reach a venerable age, this process is accomplished in their lifetime. If it be true that the distinguished thinker, who for so many years adorned the chair of philosophy in this College, now speaks to our hearts from the eternal world, and takes his place in the choir of holy souls whom we have been privileged to know on earth, and who now come and make their abode with us, and say to us many things which were never addressed to our outward ears, it is also true that he has lived to be his own best interpreter, that early controversies have sunk to rest, and prejudices have died away, and in his old age he has received from various schools of thought an appreciative recognition, and from members of various Churches a grateful tribute of honour, which would have been impossible half a century ago. Had he died when he was a young man, only a few deep and sympathetic souls, if even a few, would have been able to tell the world what he really was, and to interpret for us the hidden man of the heart, that ideal which is always vaster than its expression, and is fully known only when it has transferred itself to another's consciousness. But as it was, the implicit thought had time to unfold itself, and to reveal at least its grandest features in forms of beauty which it alone was adequate to create. Nevertheless, for those of us who knew him, even that magnificent expression of his inward life does not exhaust its grace and power; and now that he has gone away, he comes spiritually to abide with us, and speaks to our hearts from behind the veil.

It seems a descent from the height which I would gladly occupy to come to particulars which may be more interesting to those who did not personally know him, and I must be content for a time to tread on lower ground.

In dwelling on the impression made by the life and character of Dr. Martineau, and recalling to memory the principles of thought and worship to which he was most strongly attached, it is natural for us here to take our start from the College with which, during so large a part of his life, he was intimately connected. He will long be remembered as its greatest teacher; but he himself would not wish it to be forgotten that he was first an alumnus of Manchester College, seeking his culture in that modest home of learning at a time when Nonconformists were excluded from the national Universities, and that, although his thought gradually diverged very widely from that which was current when he was a student, and which at the time he embraced with all the ardour of his nature, he nevertheless found within its walls those great principles of intellectual and religious freedom which have always been its characteristic, and which he himself cherished so faithfully to the last. On account of the far-reaching effect, in his own life, of the free teaching and free learning to which the College is dedicated, and on account of the importance which he always attached to our traditional liberty, I must endeavour to explain, however imperfectly, Dr. Martineau's thought on the subject.

The teaching of theology, according to the view which is still prevalent, must be committed to the charge of the several sects, and each sect must have its own seminary in which care shall be taken that the teachers shall not contravene the dogmas of the sect. In our College, on the contrary, it is a fundamental principle that theology shall receive the same open and impartial study as every other subject; and accordingly, in occupying its philosophical chair, Dr. Martineau was in a position of complete mental freedom, in which it was his duty, not to inculcate particular views, but with singleness of mind to devote himself to the pursuit and exposition of truth. Owing to this absence of doctrinal tests it is possible for theology to adapt itself, without injurious friction, to the growing knowledge of our time; and during Dr. Martineau's long tenure of office, changes which go to the very foundation and affect the whole complexion of theological science have taken place. These changes have been recognised as the providential result of the progress of the human mind; and instead of bringing us into collision with articles of belief and trust-deeds, they have come by an acknowledged right, and the only opposition to them has been the legitimate opposition of argument and learning. The freedom which Dr. Martineau welcomed for himself he accorded in full measure to his pupils. No man knew better that we may err in giving intellectual form to our imperfect vision of the infinite God, and that our descendants may climb to heights which our feet have never trodden; and accordingly he never repressed by the weight of his authority the immature thought of the learner, but rather stimulated him to greater exertion, and taught him to love truth above all earthly gains, and to toil, though it should be with weary and lonely steps, towards that resplendent summit where she reveals herself transfigured in the cloudless light of heaven. For this mental freedom, which he maintained as a sacred trust, was not founded on scepticism, or on the peevishness of a restless mind, always learning and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth, but on faith, faith that spiritual truth always transcends our intellectual apprehension of it, and discloses new and deeper meanings to him who casts off the sloth of habit, and lifts his own longing and prayerful eyes to behold her beauty. For the humble soul he profoundly believed that there was still an open vision of God; and he felt that only that truth is vital to us which we have clasped to our hearts, and recognised as a kindling power in our own experience. It was not his aim, therefore, to awaken incessant doubt, but to aid his students in forming strong and manly convictions founded on their own personal thought, and on the witness of their own spirits, and to help them on their way by leading them to the sources of the necessary knowledge, and by enriching the partiality of their opinions by large and catholic judgments.

Before leaving this part of our subject we must for a moment survey him at his post of teacher, and we will stray into his lecture-room at a time when he had the widest reputation, and men of various denominations in philosophy and religion acknowledged their indebtedness to him in the spiritual conflicts of our day. We enter, and find seated at the head of a table, addressing some half-dozen youths, this venerable man, whose look and bearing, however, do not betoken his four-score years, and whose commanding face, once seen, cannot be forgotten; and, as we listen, we hear searching criticisms, profound and suggestive thoughts, and comprehensive philosophical reflections, conveyed in language at once of exquisite precision and finished beauty, and uttered with a play of expression and a musical sincerity of intonation, which rivet the attention, and delight the ear and warm the imagination, while putting the intellectual powers on the strain. Here is no slovenly work, no discontent with the smallness of the field which he has to till, but the best that is in him is poured forth as if he had prepared for listening thousands. This high ideal of work, made perfect for its own sake, was not unconnected with that fundamental principle of our teaching which I have attempted to describe. For it was not his task to expound some stale and borrowed notions, but to enter the sanctuary of truth, and listen for himself to the divine oracles, and then reproduce those which he was permitted to hear in a form not unworthy of their august authority. He deliberately preferred this seemingly humble field of labour on account of the grandeur of its ideal. There he found nothing to divert his heavenward gaze, or subtly mingle the fears or the solicitations of the world with his reverence for the light of God. Thus we may gain a new sense of the power of duty when we notice the narrow circle within which these splendid gifts were exercised, and remember that here was a man whom his countrymen would have delighted to honour with some conspicuous place in Church or University, if only he would have stooped below his own ideals instead of following the command of God in the simple grandeur of his untarnished faith.

The intellectual openness which he found in the College he claimed no less for the Church. In his view a Church was an association of worshippers bound together by the common adoration of the heart rather than by identity of doctrine. He perceived indeed that a certain agreement of opinion was necessary at any given time if religious communion was to have the richness of expression which the most spiritual minds could impart to it, instead of discarding its finest utterance so as to accommodate its voice to the poorest and most negative belief. But the extent of this agreement he left undefined, believing that it admitted of wide latitude, and that men must determine by their own sympathies and convictions when, for them, the limit was reached. Hence he regarded with aversion that which he described as sect-life, understanding by a sect a body of men who strictly defined their religious boundaries, and so, cutting themselves off from the fulness of the universal life, shut themselves up within one of its partial manifestations. He kept his own mind, as he would have had all men keep their minds, open to the light of heaven, from whatever quarter it might come. And thus, though his theology was what many would consider of an extreme type, and though he was practically excommunicated on this account by the great mass of Christendom, his soul was steeped in Christian sentiment, and his profoundest religious sympathies went with that providential movement of monotheistic faith, which, beginning in Old Testament times, culminated in Jesus Christ, and broke from its national limits in the form of the Christian Church. His whole endeavour was to reach the deepest spiritual roots of this wonderful growth, and so to interpret it as at once to satisfy the most rigorous demands of knowledge and criticism and the highest aspirations of faith, duty, and worship. And we should observe that in this endeavour he attached more importance to the method than to any particular opinions. Drawing the substance of his theology from the deep and permanent sources of spiritual experience, he perceived that the shape which it assumed must be determined by the variable moulds of thought and knowledge, and that theology therefore was a progressive study, in which no thinker and no Church could claim an absolute finality. His own theology underwent profound changes in the course of his life; and while to a superficial observer it may have seemed to be growing more negative, it was in reality becoming more expressive of his abiding intuitions, casting off more of the temporary and questionable in order to set forth with greater distinctness the unchangeable message of the eternal Spirit. If in this magnificent labour he may perhaps have fallen into some errors, no one would be less surprised than himself, and no one who understands him will regard the great central movement of his thought with less respect, because, as is the case with myself, in some points of criticism he is unable to put the same estimate upon the evidence. In matters of knowledge progress seldom goes straight to the goal, and the oscillations from the direct line which are made by great and original minds are no signs of perversity, but the necessary incidents of an exploring march, and are not without their value in preparing for a further advance.

This being the view which he took of the relation between the spirit of religion and its intellectual expression, it is apparent why he always objected to fixing the name of Unitarian upon any institution existing among those commonly known as Unitarians, and especially upon any of their places of worship. While he always avowed, and, when occasion required, defended his own Unitarianism, it seemed to him little short of desecration to make it deliberately, even if it were the absolute truth, a limit of religious communion, and so to substitute the dividing particularism of the intellect for the combining universalism of the spirit. He had also regard, no doubt, to possible changes in the distant future, and wished that these should be allowed to take place without the restrictions of doctrinal trust-deeds; but respect for a hypothetical future was not the principle which guided him. That lay in the supremacy of the spirit above the letter, in reverence for the spiritual sympathies which draw men of kindred soul together, even when their intellects move upon divergent paths, and which at the present time are so hampered by traditional barriers which no longer represent the real lines of cleavage. Yet it hardly gives a correct impression to say that he desired to base church fellowship on sentiment instead of opinion, if at least we confine sentiment to the domain of feeling; and in refusing to make dogma a ground of exclusion he did not, therefore, advocate a religion bereft of intellectual distinctness. Rather, if I have correctly understood him, he held that the deepest sources of faith were the same in all who had been touched and illumined by the Christian spirit, and that in these were involved certain great beliefs, without which Christian sentiment and Christian living would be impossible. But these beliefs are distinct from their intellectual expression, and may find satisfaction in different forms of creed. Thus, as science, with constant change and advance, seeks to interpret that nature which has been always present in men's thought and belief, so theology endeavours, through the laws of the intellect and the acquisition of knowledge, to interpret those great spiritual intuitions which direct the gaze of the soul towards a divine world; and each man, according to the measure of his understanding, accepts or creates certain forms of thought, which are not only needful for his own intellectual satisfaction, but serve as vehicles to convey the report of these intuitions to other minds, and to make them available for the practical work of life. But as soon as these forms of thought become obsolete through the advance of knowledge, he would discard them as obstructive of the higher activities of the soul, and instead of lamenting the continual decay of faith he saw in these progressive changes faith's opportunities, and opened the eye of his soul towards a larger and more glorious heaven. Accordingly, though no man had firmer or clearer intellectual convictions, he could not see in these the essence of religion, but found its eternal life in an inward quality of soul, which might, indeed, grow indefinitely in purity and power, but never could lose its essential characteristics. It was this that led him to insist so strongly on the fact that spiritual affinity did not follow the lines of intellectual demarkation, and that therefore the latter ought never to be drawn so as to circumscribe artificially the possibilities of spiritual communion.

And now we may ask what kind of religious life resulted from this openness of mind. Let his volumes of sermons give the answer. There we find, not a cold, critical, negative temper, but glowing affirmations which evince the writer's heartfelt devotion and spiritual insight. No man ever cared less for theological negation; and if his teaching sometimes assumed a negative form, it was only that he might clear away whatever could obstruct the free access of the soul to God, so that his negation always had in view some larger truth to which the rejected doctrine seemed opposed. He never imagined that a Church could be built upon denial, and the whole aim of his preaching was to reach the secret springs of holiness, trust, and love, and thereby bring the soul into nearer communion with God. How he succeeded in this aim those know full well who, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and longing for a nearer contact with spiritual reality, have spent blessed and memorable hours in worshipping with him, and listening to his lofty meditations, spoken with that impressive and musical voice, which owed the charm of its intonations, not to the skill of the rhetorician, but to the feelings of the heart. So it was in accordance with the whole bent of his life that in the last interview which I had with him he dwelt on the need of devoutness in our congregations, and expressed his fear that it was suffering under the pressure of denominational zeal and self-assertion.

To one other subject I must permit myself a moment's allusion. His attitude towards Christianity, especially as expressed in his great work, "The Seat of Authority in Religion," must appear to many to be an extreme one, and there are points in which even his greatest admirers are not yet able to follow him. But his reverent love towards the great Founder of Christianity was deep and heartfelt; and, though it is now many years ago, I seem still to see the look of devoutness on his face, and to hear the tender sweetness of his voice, as we spoke together about Christ. All his criticism was directed to clearing away what seemed to him accretions that obscured the beauty of the original image; and from the fiery ordeal it appeared to him that there emerged a figure of unique spiritual grandeur, the "Prince of Saints," who makes "the authority of right and the beauty of holiness come home to us as an appeal literally Divine." We may agree or not with the details of his criticism and interpretation; but surely he loved Christ so as to keep his words, and in him was fulfilled the blessed promise of Christ's coming in spiritual glory, to abide in the heart as a power of eternal life. And, higher than all, came to him the love of the Father, forgiving the sin of which he, like other saintly men, was conscious, imparting visions and revelations to his soul, and speaking the awful word of duty to his surrendered will. And now he is gone from our earthly gaze into the immortal fellowship, where the spirits of the just rejoice over the pure in heart, and where, with unveiled face, the children of God look upon His glory, and with rapt and holy love worship and adore.

At Hope-street Church, Liverpool, of which Dr. Martineau was the first minister, the memorial service on Sunday morning was conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who preached a sermon, which we reserve for publication next week.

ROSSLYN HILL, HAMPSTEAD.

At Rosslyn Hill the service on Sunday morning was conducted by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, the memorial sermon being preached by Dr. Brooke Herford.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD'S SERMON.*

"And in all ages, entering into holy souls she [wisdom] maketh them friends of God and Prophets."—Wisdom, vii. 27.

I SUPPOSE that if we should choose two words to indicate the place of James Martineau to the thoughtful people of this generation it would be these two, "friend of God" and "prophet." For these two words at once lift him out of the mere category of church leadership or intellectual disputation into that region of spiritual discernment, in which the mind of our time is owning his supremacy.

It is just fifty-two years since I came under the spell of that supremacy, when I went as a student to Manchester New College, then in Manchester. It was not first his thought, as a teacher, that took hold of me. I am afraid, I seemed to him a very poor student. For it was Sunday-school teaching, and working in the slums off business hours, that had drawn me towards the ministry; and James Martineau's course in Mental Philosophy was something utterly new and strange to me. It was different, the second year, when I had Moral Philosophy with him; that subject touched closer on human nature and will, and I began to feel the power of those splendid sentences which we old students often recognise again in his "Types of Ethical Theory." Then, I think it was, we got that sense of the divineness of human nature, and of the absolute reality of man's free will, which has been the immoveable foundation of any work we have been able to do in the world.

[While in those early days at College, Dr. Herford said, he began to feel something of the power of his teacher's thought, it was the impression of the man that was greatest.]

And that never changed! As I came to know him better, I found the singularly sweet and gracious friendliness there was behind that look of severe abstraction which was often what struck the onlooker. And with those memories, and at least enough of his teaching to put me at the heart of his thought and to make me eager for every word of his ever since, I went out to my ministry among the weavers and factory folk of the Lancashire and Yorkshire hills. A lonely ministry, with no near neighbours! Oh, how glad I was to walk ten miles over the moors to hear James Martineau preach at the opening of a village chapel; and now and then some "Provincial" or other gathering renewed the discipleship of those College years, and the impression of that pure and noble face, and that strong confidence in the Religion of the Spirit which alike face and word expressed. That was my help and guidance! And one wanted help through this half-century that was then just beginning! For it has been a trying time for the ministry of religion. I suppose it has brought more searching and shaking of the foundations of religion than any half-century in these Christian ages.

[Searching criticism of the Bible and of all the fundamental truths of religion, especially the work of the great scientists and the theorising based upon their work, made it sometimes seem as though there were nothing certain left.]

What kept the group of us younger men steady to our work, open-eyed, intensely interested, confident that all was coming out right, that religion was to stand and Christianity as the purest form of religion?

I speak not for myself alone, but for the main body of the little group of men, who through this half-century have been the heart of our Free Church life and work; and I say that we owe it primarily to the spirit Martineau's personality breathed into us in those first College years, and then secondarily to his splendid stand, ever since, at the head, in the fore-front of the long conflict for a spiritual philosophy of the universe. For all along these years, at every fresh turn in the conflict, when any new champion came into the field and, perhaps, seemed for the moment irresistible, there was sure to come from our leader some article, some lecture, some address which touched the very point, and held up before the thinking world again some of the sure eternal things, and just showed how they were really unaffected, and were not going to be shaken.

[Having spoken of Dr. Martineau's criticisms of Newman's "Phases of Faith," Tyndall's Belfast Address, and his reply to Matthew Arnold in "Why Dissent?" Dr. Herford referred finally to Dr. Martineau's decided Unitarianism and his ideal of religious fellowship. The sermon then concluded as follows.]

Ah, great heart and noble mind, farewell! Go on into that greater life which thou hast made more real to us. We meet here to-day, poorer for thy death, indeed, but so much the richer and stronger by thy long and strenuous life, that we can take our journey again into the new time with a great confident rejoicing.

* The whole of the sermon is in the Christian World Pulpit of Jan. 24.

We know not the way, indeed. The earth is often confused and dim, and man's horizons are dark with war-clouds, but we know, a little more surely than we have sometimes done, that God and heaven abide, and that the great shining thoughts of faith and duty are no optical delusions, no mere creations of man's own disordered vision, but, however poorly we may sometimes see them, are the greatest realities of the universe—the steady lights of God.

Of other memorial services, held last Sunday or on the previous Sunday, we have received a large number of reports, which it is impossible to publish in full. And, indeed, it is not necessary, for they do but repeat again and again what is in the hearts of all—reverence for the great Teacher, admiration for his wonderful gifts, gratitude for the services of his long and honoured life, and for that inspiring and abiding influence which death cannot destroy. At many services Dr. Martineau's own hymns were sung; at not a few, passages from his writings were read; at most, either the "Dead March" in Saul, or Chopin's "Funeral March" was played, the congregation standing in reverent silence.

From the reports of sermons a few further notes may be added here.

At Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, said of Dr. Martineau:—"It might be said of him what Paul did not hesitate to say of himself: 'Purely and simply, by direct manifestation of the truth, he has commended himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God.' Of course the truth did not reach every mind at once. He had been misunderstood—or disregarded—in many quarters; but still the fact remained that Dr. Martineau had been, and would remain, a supreme religious force amongst them. During his long life he was in himself a splendid illustration of mental growth and theological development. Dr. Martineau's work and the evolution which led to it were perhaps the best answer to those who deprecated any departure from the safe moorings of authority in religious matters. Free and bold as he was, he never for an instant lost sight of those abiding truths which we universally acknowledged as representing essential Christianity."

At Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, the Rev. C. J. Street said at the conclusion of a memorial sermon:—"If the venerable figure of James Martineau is imposing to us to-day, how much greater will he seem to the generations to come, from whom he will receive more justice and attention as he is seen to be the possession of mankind, and not merely the leader of a small and ostracised sect. No greater man has been given to the nineteenth century; and it is fitting that in a ripe old age he should pass away with the century to whose infancy he came as a blessing. With pride we remember to-day, and shall bear in our hearts through all time the fact that he was the head of our own household of faith. May our hearts expand with charity and sympathy like his, and at the same time may our minds be as insistent for the truth, even though the world will not yet receive it."

At St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, the Rev. R. B. Drummond quoted Mr. Gladstone's saying of Dr. Martineau, "The greatest of living thinkers," and added: "We may probably accept the praise—at any rate it was unbiassed, and came from one well qualified to judge. Assuredly, none of his contemporaries moved more easily in the upper regions of thought, nor was there ever a doubt that he could encounter on perfectly equal terms the strongest intellects of his time. . . . James Martineau has died, but he is not dead. He is more living now than when he was alive. He lives in his works, in the many helpful and inspiring volumes which he has left as his legacy to the world; he lives still more in the hearts of all who loved and revered him; and he will be a bright beacon light to thousands of his brethren for many years, perhaps for many generations to come."

At Barton-street Chapel, Gloucester, the Rev. Walter Lloyd said that Dr. Martineau solved the problem he had himself described sixty-three years ago—"how to combine the freest intellect with the loftiest devotion; and while inquiring always, to love and worship still."

Memorial services are also reported as having been held at the following places, but this must not be taken by any means as an exhaustive list of the services held:—

DIVINE SONSHIP.

One of the most striking and hopeful features in the pulpit utterances of the present day is the emphasis which is laid upon the doctrine of Immanence, or Indwelling, of God in human nature. The Supreme Being is no longer regarded as simply communicating with individual souls through the mediation of priest or prophet, of Bible or Church. He is a self-revealing Presence in every rational and moral spirit; and in all the forms of religious worship, in all social relationships, in all the business transactions of the world, He is tacitly appealed to by all men whenever they think of truth, of justice, and of the divine claims of brotherliness and love. It is because of this universal immanent presence of the one Eternal God in each man's reason, in each man's conscience, in every emotion of self-sacrificing love, that it is impossible for any man to regard himself as wholly isolated from his fellow-men; for the same indwelling God is in us all, and every act of deliberate selfishness calls forth a protest and a condemnation from the Father within us. He who persists in disregarding the voice of this one God and Father who is in us all, he who looks simply "to his own things and not also to the things of others," soon discovers that this attempt to separate his own interests and aims from the interests and aims of his fellow-men is inevitably bringing leanness into his own soul, and robbing his own life of all that gives it true peace, true satisfaction, true dignity.

There is, I believe, no more convincing evidence of the marvellously clear and profound spiritual insight of Jesus of Nazareth than the fact that his view of God as the invisible but all-pervading Spirit who is present and active in every object of Nature, but who most fully reveals His own true essence and character in the pure hearts of the most saintly men, is the very conception of God which at the present time the foremost science, the deepest philosophical thought, and the most fervent piety unite in affirming and illustrating.

Much of the so-called Agnosticism and non theistic Ethicism which is now drawing away from the Churches some of the most thoughtful persons has, it seems to me, no deeper cause than the fact that the conception of God which has too long dominated Christian thought—the conception of God as an external Creator and Ruler as distinct and separate from human souls as these souls are distinct and separate from one another—is seen to be no longer capable of being harmonized with the scientific knowledge, the philosophic thought, and the clearest moral and spiritual insight of our time. It is, I say, because many reflective persons have thus ceased to be able to conceive of God as popular theologians have pictured Him, that they have supposed that their belief in God has passed away. But, as one of our greatest religious teachers has well remarked, it is the very nearness of God's presence, His intimate interpenetration of the soul's inmost daily life, which has for a season hidden Him from their intellectual vision; and their supposed Agnosticism will, I believe, give place to a purer and nobler Theism so soon as these earnest thinkers see God as Jesus saw Him, and recognise

His self-revealing voice and living presence in every noble ideal, in every imperative demand for fairness and justice, in every determination to maintain the truth at all hazards, in every self-surrender to the enthusiasm of humanity, and especially in that consciousness of divine sympathy and of infinite support which wells up in the soul that reverently heeds and resolutely obeys the voice of the indwelling Father.

Let us consider for a moment what is the relation between the Eternal God and the universe of Nature and of life as it now presents itself to devout thought.

The external universe is not a collection of independent objects, but bears every mark of being a unitary organism. Every part of it has reference to every other part; every atom and every form of life exists not only for its own sake, but for the furtherance of the well-being of the rest of the cosmos. The inorganic world provides for the vegetable world; the vegetable sustains the animal, and both inorganic and organic evolution furnish the needful conditions for the appearance and the development of the human race. The sun pours forth an unceasing stream of energy that life may abound upon the earth, and that man may have the necessary force at his disposal for the working of the machinery which his ingenuity invents, that so civilisation may increasingly enrich human existence on earth with countless utilities and luxuries. As the late Professor Huxley, who was certainly not prejudiced in favour of theistic belief, was constrained to admit, when we look at the process of cosmical development as a whole the evidence of the presence of a rational unifying intelligence seems irresistible, and the entire course of evolution appears to be most adequately described as "a materialised logical process." It is true that this eminent biologist also maintained that though there is clear evidence of rational direction in the stages of evolution below man, there are no signs of moral purpose there. But Huxley's antithesis between the non-morality of Nature and the morality of man has since been vigorously called in question by careful thinkers well versed both in science and philosophy, such as the late Professor H. Drummond, of Scotland, and Professor John Fiske, of America, and they unite in concluding—to use the words of the latter writer—"that the principles of morality have their roots in the deepest foundations of the universe; that the cosmic process is ethical in the profoundest sense; that in that far-off morning of the world when the stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy, the beauty of self-sacrifice and disinterested love formed the chief burden of the mighty theme."

It is, however, all-important to notice that while in the lower forms of inanimate and of animate existences the immanent God is ever present and active, causing each part to subserve the good of the whole, it is only when the human stage is reached that the indwelling Father makes Himself directly known in the consciousness of the beings whom He calls into existence. He is present and active in the devotion wherewith the animal mother sacrifices herself for her offspring; but the animal appears to follow only its strongest impulse, and as yet knows not the divine source whence these impulses proceed. But when the merely animal stage is passed, and the needful conditions are there for the appearance of the rational and moral man upon the scene, a most momentous change and advance takes place. Then for the first time, so far as we can see, God not only acts through the creature, but by slow degrees reveals Himself and His purposes in the creature's consciousness, and thus the creature of God becomes, in a very real sense, the son of God—a conscious sharer to some extent in the Father's divinity, a child invited and enjoined to knowingly co-operate with the Eternal in establishing His kingdom upon the earth. The human father and mother also feel in some degree the paternal and maternal instinct to sacrifice, if need be, their own comfort for the sake of their offspring, but they feel something more than this. They are conscious, also, of a divine claim upon them to do their best for their children's welfare; they are conscious, also, that they possess freedom to either recognise or to resist that claim; and thus, if they do their duty, they voluntarily and intentionally, as well as instinctively, co-operate with the Divine Love which is seeking to work in them and through them. And if they wilfully neglect this divine claim, and look chiefly to their own comfort and not to the true welfare of their children, they are well aware that it is no longer a mere instinct that is being resisted, but that it is the inner voice of the Eternal, it is their very sonship to the indwelling God that is being outraged, and their remorseful consciences will sooner or later bring painfully home to them the inevitable penalties of this violation of the recognised authority of the Father within them.

These considerations cannot, I think, fail to clearly indicate where we are to look for the immediate self-revelation which God makes of Himself and of His essential character to His human offspring. Surely we find it in that moral and spiritual ideal which, in varying degrees of fulness and purity, haunts and inspires us all, and from which no one of us can possibly free himself. In every consciousness of what ought to be, as contrasted with what is, we have a vision, more or less distinct, of some real aspect of God's eternal life. Even the least moralized of human beings have some glimpses of God's essential character, some promptings of self-sacrificing love, some sense of honour, some feeling of obligation "to look not only to their own things, but also to the things of others." That ideal of duty, which is God's self-revealing presence in the soul, is in some natures very rudimentary and partially distorted through unhappy heredity and evil surroundings; but it is never wholly absent, and no human being ever lived a thoroughly selfish and self-seeking life without feeling at times the bitter self-condemnation of his own meanness and pettiness, and at length that miserable self-disgust which takes away from life all that makes it seem worth living. The selfish pleasure-seeker cannot fail to echo at last the despairing words of the writer of Ecclesiastes: "I said in my heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth; therefore enjoy pleasure. . . . And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them; I withheld not my heart from any joy. . . . Then I looked at all the works that my hand had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do; and behold, all was vanity and a striving after wind, and there was no profit under the sun." What, then, is the grand moral which this book of Ecclesiastes teaches? Surely it is this, that each rational soul is in a very true sense the son of God; that in the high aspirations and ideals which arise within him he is truly made in the very image of the Father, and that therefore he cannot possibly find peace and blessedness till he seeks to conform his life and his character to that divine pattern. Many years before the advent of the prophet of Nazareth deep thinkers had had some perception of this fundamental truth, that man may truly be called a son of God. Thus the Greek poet Aratus, who lived in the third century before Christ, from whose poem Paul quoted, having probably learned it by heart in his school-boy days at Tarsus, writes as follows:—

Let us begin with Zeus. Let every mortal raise
His grateful voice to tune God's endless praise.
God fills the heaven, the earth, the sea, the air,
We feel His spirit moving here and everywhere;
And we His offspring are. He, ever good,
Daily provides for man his daily food.

. . . . . .

To Him, the First, the Last, all homage yield—
Our Father, wonderful, our help, our shield.

But it is not to the Greek poets, but to him in whom Hebrew prophecy culminated, that we must look if we would fully understand the deep meaning of this expression "for we His offspring are." It means at all events this much, that the moral ideals and the spiritual affections and aspirations which arise within us are partial and progressive revelations to us of the essential nature and character of God. In His being these ideals of ours are eternally real, and only in so far as we seek to realize them in our character and our conduct are we fulfilling God's purpose in regard to us, and taking the path to that true blessedness which is attained as human aspirations and efforts pass into accord with the self-revelation of the Father within.

As sons of God we are partakers of the spirit of God, and that spirit is a spirit of unlimited kindness and love; a spirit which looks not to its own things, but also to the things of others. In this spirit we think less and less of our own personal gains and personal gratifications, and more and more of diffusing around us, as far as lies in our power, the means of happiness and of spiritual health and wealth. Thus only can we approximate in our daily life to the life of God and become, in the words of the Apostle, "imitators of God as dear children." Christ well knew by personal experience that this is the only possible road to perfect blessedness, and hence it was that he uttered those immortal words: "Whosoever shall seek to gain his life shall lose it, but whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it"—the life eternal.

LET us only be patient, patient, and let God our Father teach His own lesson His own way. Let us try to learn it well and learn it quickly; but do not let us fancy that He will ring the school-bell and send us to play before our lesson is learned.—Charles Kingsley.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterian, and other Free Christians.—At the usual quarterly meeting of the General Purposes Committee of the above Association, held in Belfast on the 16th inst., the following resolution was passed unanimously and in solemn silence:—"The General Purposes Committee of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians hereby place on record their sense of the great loss sustained by the Free Churches in particular, and Liberal Christianity the wide world over in general, by the death of the Rev. Dr. Martineau, and testify also their sincere and lasting gratitude for his religious help and guidance as well as their heartfelt sympathy with his family in their bereavement."

Brighton—On Friday, Jan. 12, the Sunday-school Christmas treat took place. After tea there were games, and at seven o'clock Mrs. Wilson distributed prizes to forty scholars. Two children have not missed a Sunday for four successive years. The school has more scholars on the "roll" than it has ever had. At eight o'clock there was an entertainment of "living pictures," which was much enjoyed.

Cardiff.—A new organ costing £500 has just been given to the West Grove Church by the executors of the late Mr. James Pyke Thompson. The instrument (erected to the memory of the deceased gentleman) was opened on the 17th inst., in the presence of a crowded congregation. The presentation to the trustees was made by Mr. Charles Thompson, and was acknowledged by Mr. George Phelps. Mr. William Legassick responded on behalf of the committee. This was followed by an organ recital, a public tea at six o'clock, and in the evening by a miscellaneous concert in the church. The organ (by Messrs. Foster and Andrews, of Hull) is a very fine instrument, and adds yet another proof of the deep interest taken by the Thompson family in the cause at Cardiff. The old instrument has been given to the congregation at Pantyfaith.

Chelmsford.—An invitation tea was given on Wednesday, the 24th inst., by Miss Madocks, to the scholars, teachers, and friends. In the course of the after proceedings some bound volumes of Young Days, the gift of Mrs. Rutt, of London, were presented to several of the scholars. Mr. Harry was, through illness, unable to be present.

East London Durning Hall Mission, Elsa-street, Limehouse.—The mission during the past year has again made considerable advances in all its departments. The Provident Association received £1,131 7s. 5d., as against for the previous year £877 12s. 6d., which was at that time the largest sum that had been received in any year. The Sunday-school, with five class-rooms in the old building, and the upper and lower floors of the new hall, provides accommodation for about 350 scholars, and is always crowded on Sunday afternoons, there being an excellent staff of thirty-one teachers and three superintendents. The attendance at the services did not show any great improvement during the past eight months of the year, but later the special services proved very successful, and the hall was well filled with adults on the Sunday evenings, and the new year starts with the promise of continued success. The brass band has now a men's branch and a boys' branch, and each meet regularly twice a week with most satisfactory results. Sewing classes, mothers' meetings, and the industrial guild are held every week, and in these making and mending of clothes are taught and carried on, while rooms are also provided for those who wish to read or play parlour games. For the men the money club or Provident Association, with no secretarial expenses, no fees, and but small fines, proves of immense advantage as compared with the clubs held in public-houses with heavy fines, large fees, and constant temptation to drink. There is also a Christian Life Guild, in which small subscriptions are collected to meet special cases of distress among the members. The missionary, the Rev. John Toye, continues to extend his influence in the neighbourhood, and his committee for putting down street gambling is working a marked improvement.

Essex Hall Temperance Association.—The Association has arranged, in connection with the Triennial Conference, to hold a meeting in the Leicester Temperance Hall, at 6.30 P.M., on Thursday, April 5, to discuss the recommendations of Lord Peel's Committee. It is expected that the Earl of Carlisle will preside, and that the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, S. A. Steinthal, J. T. Sunderland, and other well-known temperance workers and sympathisers will be among the speakers.

Great Hucklow.—The annual Sunday-school party and prize distribution of the "Old Chapel" Sunday-school took place on Saturday, Jan. 13. Tea was followed by an enjoyable programme of recitations, music, and sketches. The schoolroom was crowded. The Rev. W. H. Rose presided, and presented the prizes to the scholars.

Holywood, co. Down.—On Tuesday evening, Jan. 16, the annual Sunday-school soirée was held in the schoolroom of the First Presbyterian (Non-Subscribing) Church, Holywood. There were over a hundred pupils present, besides a number of parents and friends. Tea was provided at 6.30 o'clock, after which the members of the drill class gave a most enjoyable display, which included flag and ball exercises and songs; the children did remarkably well, and were a credit to their teachers, Miss Patterson and Miss Malcolm. The principal attraction of the evening was a Christmas tree, for which the elder girls had dressed all the dolls and also made useful presents for the teachers.

Hull.—On Wednesday evening, Jan. 17, the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds, delivered his annual lecture to the members of the Literary and Social Union and other members of the Park-street congregation. In spite of an inclement evening, and the illness prevalent in the city, about sixty attended, and thoroughly enjoyed Mr. Hargrove's delightful treatment of the subject, "The Beginning of the Nineteenth Century Poetry."

Leeds: Hunslet.—On the 20th inst. the annual teachers and parents' party of the Sunday-school was held. After tea there was a public meeting, Mr. John Thornton in the chair, who cast a genial glow over the proceedings. The prizes—thirty-four in number—for regular attendance during the past year were given by Mr. F. Clayton, of Mill Hill, a most earnest Sunday-school worker, who spoke in cheery terms to the scholars as they came up to take their prizes. The report and balance sheet were read, and showed the school to be in a healthy condition.

London: Bermondsey.—The sixth annual meeting of the Band of Hope and Temperance Society was held on the 23rd inst. The Rev. Harold Rylett presided, and was supported by the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope (who also distributed the juniors' medals and prizes), Messrs. W. G. Dannell and H. Rodgers (Band of Hope Union), and Mr. A. H. Biggs. Parents and friends were well represented. The secretary (Mr. A. W. Harris) reported an average attendance at the Band of Hope of fifty-three for the whole year, excluding non-members at special meetings, a number of which had been very successfully held and largely supported. A resolution in favour of the "Children's Bill" was unanimously carried.

London: Peckham.—The members of the Avondale Band of Hope have collected seven guineas for the Band of Hope Union and the Temperance Hospital, and prizes will be awarded to the collectors at the Exeter Hall Soirée, on Monday, Jan. 29.

London: Stamford-street.—Under the auspices of the Essex Hall Temperance Association, a meeting was held on Thursday, Jan. 18, when an interesting address was delivered by Mr. A. H. Biggs on "The best Means of Retaining our Elder Scholars as Abstainers." The address was full of excellent suggestions, and was followed by a discussion. The Rev. F. Allen occupied the chair.

London: Stoke Newington Green.—At the annual meeting of the congregation on Sunday last, a resolution was passed expressing appreciation of the work, writings, and services of the late Dr. Martineau, and sympathy with his family at their loss.

London: Welsh Service.—In spite of very unfavourable weather, there was a fairly good attendance at Essex Hall, last Sunday evening, when the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, Cefncoed, Merthyr, conducted the service.

Manchester: Platt.—The annual Christmas tea party, followed by the distribution of prizes for good conduct, punctuality and regular attendance, took place in the schools on Saturday, Jan. 13. Of parents and scholars 109 sat down to table. After tea addresses were given by the Rev. C. T. Poynting and Mr. G. L. Phelps, the superintendent, and prizes were given to twenty-seven scholars. A short dramatic performance, followed by the amusing dialogue "Geese," was given by some friends, the evening coming to an end all too quickly for young people. The Temperance Guild gains each year a few new members. This winter a series of fortnightly evening meetings are being tried, at which papers by various friends are read, followed by discussion. The Thrift Club is flourishing, having a large membership outside our own denomination. The Goose Club, likewise with a large outside membership, has been again successfully carried out, members making weekly payments from August till December, and according to the amount paid by each member, receiving tea and groceries, besides a ham, or a goose, or turkey.

Nantwich.—On Sunday evening a collection was made in aid of the local fund for the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Relief Fund.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting of the Union was held at Glossop on Saturday, Jan. 20, about ninety persons being present. After tea, the President, Mr. John Barrow, occupied the chair. Before the business of the meeting was proceeded with, the following resolution was, on the motion of the Rev. N. Green, and Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., carried in silence, "That this meeting of the N.C.U.S.S.U., desires to place on record its deep sense of the loss sustained by the recent death of Dr. Martineau, who by his works and his life has contributed immeasurably to the moral and spiritual growth, not only of his own particular Church, but of all whose minds have been open to the reception of the broad truths of pure religion as distinguished from the mere creeds throughout the civilised world." The Rev. A. C. Fox, B.A., read an excellent paper entitled "Where are we drifting to?" and the discussion thereon was taken part in by the Rev. N. Green, Miss Dorman, Miss Lees, and Messrs. S. Ashworth, E. B. Broaderick, A. Slater, J. W. Wild, and F. Ashton. Mr. Fox replied, and the meeting closed with the usual vote of thanks, Hymn, and Benediction.

Portsmouth.—At a recent meeting of the Portsmouth Literary and Scientific Society held in the Grand Jury Room at the Town Hall, the President, the Rev. C. G. Lang, in the chair, a lecture was delivered by Mr. G. Cosens Prior on "Cuneiform Inscriptions."

Sale.—The second portion of the winter session of the Social Guild was opened with a debate on the question, "Should the War be Stopped?" The Rev. James Forrest, in opening the debate in the affirmative, urged that, before further blood was shed, some step should be taken to arrange a cessation of hostilities with a view to a re-consideration of the questions at issue between ourselves and the South African Republics. He pleaded for a spirit of magnanimity and forbearance, and deplored the evil influence of the Press which did so much to inflame public passion and arouse a spirit of hatred and malice. An amendment to the effect that for the sake of national prestige, the war, however much to be deplored, must be carried through, was lost by a large majority. In connection with the Guild there have been organised Saturday evening entertainments for children, and it is hoped to carry these on during the winter.

South Shields.—Mr. Thomas Paxton, of Gateshead, has kindly consented to take charge of the pulpit for the present quarter, and his efforts are already meeting with success. At the conclusion of his sermon on Sunday evening, Mr. Paxton referred to the great loss which Unitarianism and the world at large had sustained by the death of the revered Dr. Martineau. The preacher also touched upon the decease on Wednesday week of Mr. James Downey, J.P., one of the trustees of the church, and for many years its honoured treasurer. At the conclusion of the service, the organist played the "Dead March," the congregation standing.

NOT a having and a resting, but a growing and a becoming, is the character of perfection as culture conceives it, and here, too, it coincides with religion.—Matthew Arnold.

Schools, etc.

BEAUFORT, WOODSTOCK AVENUE, REDLAND, BRISTOL.

MISS TUCKER, for over 8 years Assistant Mistress at Channing House has, with two of her sisters, opened at the above address, a HIGH-CLASS BOARDING SCHOOL for GIRLS.

The TERM begins on WEDNESDAY, Jan. 17th.

Fees:—For Pupils of 12 years of age and over, £12 12s., and for those under 12, £10 10s. per term.

Reference is kindly permitted to Miss Emily Sharpe, 32, Highbury-place, London, N., and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., Durdham Park, Redland, Bristol.

The School is within easy walking distance of the Downs, the Zoological Gardens, &c.

EDGBASTON COLLEGE for GIRLS,
Bristol Road, Edgbaston, Birmingham.

PRINCIPAL—MISS BAILY.

HEADMISTRESS—MISS ELEANOR MOSS, B.A. Hons.

A limited number of Boarders taken at residence of Principal.

The College, which is opposite the residence, has accommodation for 120 pupils. Lawn tennis, gymnasium, asphalte playground.

The Curriculum is based on the Cambridge Examination regulations, and resident pupils have the advantage of Public School life combined with home comforts.

Application to Secretary, Miss S. AWDRY.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, SOUTH MARINE TERRACE, ABERYSTWITH.

PRINCIPAL ... MRS. MARLES THOMAS.

Pupils most successfully prepared for Public Examinations. Scholarships have been obtained at the University Colleges. Special attention paid to the physical side of education. Gymnasium. Swedish drill.

HOME SCHOOL for GIRLS, FELIX CAVERNA, FELIXTOWE (in connection with Bestreben High School, Brondesbury).

Pupils can be prepared for public examinations; but as these tend to narrow school work, at no time is the school work governed by the syllabus of any one of these examinations. Music is made a speciality. Of twelve pupils who entered at Felix Caverna for the R.A.M.R.C. (local schools), eleven have passed, three gaining "distinction."

Felixstowe is much recommended by medical men for children.

The house stands facing the sea.

Outdoor games and social evenings for the pupils are carefully planned and supervised.

The late Professor Morley, in an admirable address after the distribution of prizes to the pupils at Bestreben High School, said: "Although by no means wishing to undervalue in any way the good work done by large public schools, he would 'deplore the loss of private schools.' Individualism was the life of the community."

Successes gained on public examinations have been 85 per cent.

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND LITTLE BOYS.—CONAMUR, SANDGATE, KENT.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT re-assembled on Tuesday, and at once entered on a long discussion as to the causes of the war in South Africa. Would that it had been possible rather to discuss whether some honourable means might not be found by which a truce might be called to this humiliating and disastrous war! But as yet the spirit of conciliation appears to have little chance, and meanwhile we are asked to quiet our conscience by the assurance that this is a war of liberation, in defence of the higher civilisation and of the native population against a brutal tyranny. To those of our readers who accept that view we commend the study of a pamphlet by Mr. H. R. Fox Bourne, secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society, on "Blacks and Whites in South Africa: An Account of the Past Treatment and Present Condition of South African Natives under British and Boer Control" (P. S. King and Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith-street, Westminster, S.W. 1s.):—

No one can deny [says Mr. Fox Bourne] that in their dealings with natives and with native questions those responsible for the administration of affairs in the South African Republic have been guilty of many grievous sins, both of omission and of commission. But whether the natives would have received much better treatment, or any, if the Outlanders and their champions in Capetown and Downing-street had been masters of the situation is, to say the least, very doubtful. All that these Outlanders desire and the object of nearly all they claim, is power to use the natives in any way that pleases them for their own profit.

This is the view taken also by the Rev. Richard Lyttle, of Monyrea, in his pamphlet on the "Origin of the Fight with the Boers" (to be had of the author, 1d.), to a fourth edition of which he has added a new chapter on the "Boers' Treatment of Natives," and at a recent meeting at Salford we observe that Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., is reported to have said that in the present war "Our blood and treasure were being poured out in order to compel the blacks, by means of hut taxes and labour taxes, to work in the mines, and all that the capitalists desired to secure by what they called 'good government' was a plentiful supply of cheap Kaffir labour." Those words were not lightly spoken, and they present a view of the matter not to be neglected in the attempt to form a just judgment as to the present conflict, and as to what the future policy of this country ought to be.

ON Thursday, Jan. 25, the day of Mr. Ruskin's funeral, a large congregation met by invitation at the Northgate-end Chapel, Halifax, at 3 P.M., the hour of the funeral. There was a quiet and impressive service, in which Mr. Millson, Mr. J. H. Whitley, J.P., and Mr. Montague Blatchford took part. After an organ voluntary the service opened with the singing of four verses from In Memoriam, beginning—

How pure at heart and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold
Should be the man whose thought would hold
An hour's communion with the dead.

Our congregations often shut up to themselves for worship may find a useful function by providing the opportunity for expression of feelings shared by many who do not belong to them. At Northgate-end Chapel such services have been held in memory of Browning and Tennyson, and now of Ruskin, always finding many who welcomed the opportunity.

THE whole of the correspondence between Dr. Mivart and Cardinal Vaughan in reference to the articles by the former, to which we referred last week, has now been published, and the breach between the man of science and the Roman Church is seen to be complete. The following are significant passages from Dr. Mivart's letters:—

It is now evident that a vast and impassable abyss yawns between Catholic dogma and science, and no man with ordinary knowledge can henceforth join the communion of the Roman Catholic Church if he correctly understands what its principles and its teaching really are, unless they are radically changed.

. . . . . .

As to what you say about "private judgment," all of us, however submissive to authority, must, in the last resort, rest upon the judgment of our individual reason. How otherwise could we know that authority had spoken at all or what it had said? It is impossible to accept anything as true which is a contradiction in terms. Upon that truth all theological reasoning is based and all other reasoning also.

It has long been painful to me to think of the teaching given in Catholic schools and often proclaimed from the pulpit. There need be small surprise at the opposition existing in France to the authoritative teaching of fables, fairy tales, and puerile and pestilent superstitions. Happily I can now speak with entire frankness as to all my convictions. Liberavi animam meam. I can sing my Nunc dimittis and calmly await the future.

DR. J. GUINESS ROGERS preached farewell sermons last Sunday at the Clapham Congregational Church, on his retirement after a pastorate of thirty-five years, and fifty-four years of active service in the ministry. The text of his evening sermon was, "For I determined not to know anything among you but Jesus Christ and Him crucified," a text which he had taken fifty-four years ago at the foundation of his ministry, and had held to as his ideal ever since. At a previous farewell meeting warm gratitude to Dr. Rogers for his long ministry was expressed by present and past members of the congregation, and a presentation of £1,100 was made to him and of a sapphire and diamond ring to Mrs. Rogers as a souvenir of the occasion. The farewell services were fraught with strong emotion.

WE are glad to see the following note in this week's Christian World, though Mr. Armstrong's initials are there wrongly printed. The articles referred to were originally contributed to THE INQUIRER :—

The passing away of Dr. Martineau has intensified in all circles the interest in his splendid contributions to religious thought. A large number of readers who are not able to procure his larger and more expensive works will, we believe, be interested to learn that a series of papers on his magnum opus, the Study of Religion, written soon after its appearance by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., of Liverpool, will shortly be published as an eighteenpenny book by Messrs. James Clarke and Co. The lectures give a very complete idea of the scope and main lines of argument of Dr. Martineau's great work, and will bring its powerful vindication of spiritual religion, as against the negations of materialistic philosophy, into reach of the most meagrely-furnished purse."

"THE Life of Dean Milman," which has just been published, contains the following interesting reference to Dr. Martineau in a letter to Mrs. Austen in January, 1866 :—

Many thanks for Mr. Martineau. I have only his Review writings, but they have impressed me with a very high opinion of his intellect and (tell it not in Oxford) of his religion. When you speak of the old Unitarianism, I presume you mean the low and dry Belshamism, about as religious as much of the high and dry in other quarters . . . For Mr. Martineau I have the utmost respect; and if we come across each other, I suspect that there would be much sympathy.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—At a meeting of Governors held on Jan. 17, the Rev. S. Alfred Steinthal in the chair, it was resolved "That the Governors of Willaston School, in recording the death of the late Rev. J. Martineau, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., D.Litt., express their deep sense of the great services rendered by him to the cause of unsectarian religious education which is the fundamental principle of Willaston School. They thankfully feel that in receiving from him a donation to the building and endowment fund in the last year of his life, the Governors have received a great encouragement in the work to which they have set their hands, and the school a priceless benediction. They tender to the members of his family their deep and respectful sympathy."

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.—At a meeting of the Committee on Jan. 30, Mr. P. M. Martineau in the chair, the following resolution was passed:—"That the Committee of the London Domestic Mission desire to record their profound sense of the loss they, in common with all sections of the community, have sustained by the death of the Rev. James Martineau, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., D.Litt. They are mindful of Dr. Martineau's continued and unfailing sympathy with the principles and the work of the Mission, and are deeply conscious to how large an extent its success has been due to his powerful and inspiring support. They reflect, with sincere gratitude, that whilst as thinker and teacher his influence has been so great and beneficial, some of his last public utterances were spoken at their annual meetings, and that only a few years ago he worded the appeal, which the Committee issued to subscribers for the increased help, then so urgently needed. The Committee would convey to the members of Dr. Martineau's family their most heartfelt sympathy in the loss which has befallen them, and assure them that by none will Dr. Martineau's memory be more affectionately cherished than by those who are trying, in his spirit, to raise the downfallen and to carry the Christian gospel into the humblest homes of London."

THE annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, was held in the Memorial Hall on Wednesday evening. Our report of the proceedings we must hold over until next week.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR,—The letter from Mr. James Shield, which appears in your issue of the 20th, tempts me to write you upon this subject, for though I do not question the fact of its having been intended to be written in a "judicial temper," yet it contains some very "special pleading."

One clause plainly requires correction. Mr. Shield states that "It is palpable to anyone fairly acquainted with South African history, and not blinded by party spirit, that if during the negotiations President Kruger had bonâ fide made any reasonable concessions, the conflict might at least have been deferred. But no; being armed to the teeth, he expected to crush us as easily as he did in 1881, and he would not budge an inch."

Mr. Shield has only to consult the history of the negotiations as told in the Blue Books issued by the Colonial Office to see that President Kruger did make large and important concessions, increased as time went on, and the demands of our Government were increased with every fresh prospect of a settlement. On July 13 the Naturalisation Law, granting seven years' retrospective franchise, was passed, and Mr. Chamberlain telegraphed on July 27 to Sir A. Milner:—"Happily each new scheme seems to have been improvement, and Her Majesty's Government hope latest proposals may prove to be basis for settlement on lines laid down at Conference."—(C. 9518, p. 12.)

The terms of the law are given at length on page 41 of the same Blue Book, and appear to be, as compared with some of the provisions of our own electoral law, simple and workable enough.

Again, on Aug. 19 the Transvaal Government offered, with certain conditions, nine-tenths of which Mr. Chamberlain has stated the Government accepted, to concede the five years' retrospective naturalisation which Sir Alfred Milner asked for at the Conference and a larger number of seats in the Raad for the goldfields than he had suggested. This offer encouraged by the British Resident (C. 9521, p. 45), by Sir Alfred Milner (p. 46), and by Mr. Chamberlain in a telegram not printed in our Blue Books, but contained in the Transvaal Green Book published in September, was greeted by Mr. Chamberlain with the Highbury speech (Aug. 26) and with the despatch of Aug. 23 (C. 9521, p. 49), which so far from being an acceptance appears to any careful reader, and did so appear to the Transvaal Government, to be an unconditional and discourteous refusal. It was this despatch undoubtedly, more than anything else, which made war inevitable, by finally convincing the Transvaal Government that no concessions were of any use.

As to the unanimity of "religious" (!) opinion, Mr. Shield is welcome to what comfort it can afford him. I should not have used this adjective myself to describe those who, holding the commission of the God of Love, preach "hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness" towards children of the same Father and worshippers at the same shrine. THE ENGLISH PRESBYTERIANS.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Lloyd's long letter very carefully, but without being convinced. I "threw down" no "challenge" to him, but simply expressed as reviewer the judgment I thought just. I still think that his book has a controversial twang which weakens its historical impressiveness. And while I have frankly admitted the value of his point that Open Trusts were not at all peculiar to Presbyterians, and that we have to look elsewhere for the explanation of the gradual widening of Presbyterianism towards Unitarianism, still we have to look for it. The fact is too large to be explained by the mere confusion of names, of which Mr. Lloyd gives some curious instances. That, after the Presbyterians and Independents had attempted to unite, and by and by in many places had split apart again, the two names were often used in loose and confused senses is perfectly true. But that does not alter my conviction, gathered from long familiarity with the history of the Old Dissent, that the Presbyterian element brought to the attempted Union, and afterwards in their separation still retained, a less rigid orthodoxy, and a certain practical breadth of mind which caused it, so that, in many places, of the two congregations thus formed, the Presbyterian was the wider and opener to such new truth as that of Lindsey and Priestley. So, while declining further discussion, I must re-affirm my belief that the Presbyterians were a distinct and noble element in the Old Dissent, with which we may still be proud to claim special connection.

TRIBUTES TO DR. MARTINEAU.

From "The Spectator."

The first thought which occurs to the mind when thinking of the late Dr. Martineau is his quite unique personality. England will be likely to see another Gladstone, Tennyson, Ruskin, or Arnold before she sees another Martineau. We do not say that Dr. Martineau was a greater man than any of these, that he had a more powerful mind or a finer spiritual nature. We do say that he was a rarer type of man than any of them. He was alike French and English. From his Huguenot ancestors, who went to the old city of Norwich after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, Martineau had inherited the very finest elements of the best mind and character of France, so that he was akin to Fénelon, Pascal, Joubert. At the same time he had imbibed the best English spirit, the solid character of the "grave livers" of English Nonconformity. This blending of the best elements of two nations, combining the strongest moral and intellectual qualities, went to the building up of a personality so powerful and so unique, that whoever came under its gracious spell was never quite the same person afterwards. He had seen a vision; a higher order of man had touched his own nature, and had suggested to him heights and depths heretofore unknown. It was not that any new set of opinions had been presented to him. We doubt whether the historian of the English thought of our time will credit Martineau with any distinct modification of the theological or philosophical opinions of this age. It was something that went below opinion; it was a revelation of spiritual character and power. That was the impressive thing in James Martineau. Holding this view, we should, perhaps, appraise differently from some the value of his writings. Important as are such of his later works as the "Types of Ethical Theory" or "The Seat of Authority in Religion," we have no hesitation in saying that in his wonderful sermons known collectively as "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," and in his "Endeavours after the Christian Life," the real Martineau, the spiritual teacher who will endure, has accomplished his greatest and finest work.

Spirit speaks to spirit in these pages, which are worthy of the finest mysticism of the Catholic Church at her best, while at the same time manly, healthy, in harmony with human reason, and couched in a singularly noble and remarkable prose style. One must not, in passing, omit to refer to Dr. Martineau's style. Its severity and restraint perchance repel some. But he who thinks that the note of distinction is the finest element in prose literature, will then admit that while Ruskin or Arnold may give greater and more varied delight, we should lose one of the finest and purest products of our time had we not the dignified prose writings of James Martineau.

From "The Athenæum."

One of the most striking things about his contributions to English thought was their style, which contrasted so favourably with the cacophonies of the Neo-Hegelians. Only Mill can vie with him as a stylist among the professed philosophers, and even Mill he surpassed in grace if not in lucidity. It has been plausibly argued that this combination of clearness and elegance in Martineau's style was due to his Huguenot descent, and he was only rivalled in this regard by Newman, himself derived from the same stock.

The style certainly reflected the man in Martineau's case. The beauty of order, the nobility of tone, the chastened enthusiasm, the austerity of truth with the charm of sincerity, shone out both in the man and his books. No one that has been honoured by his acquaintance even in the slightest degree can have failed to be touched by the grave yet winning courtesy, the utter absence of self-consciousness, the consistent appeal to none but the highest motives, the constant endeavour to seek and disseminate the truth.

From "The Christian World."

The venerable James Martineau is now at last among the saintly dead whose "works do follow them." Of him these words are eminently true, not only because he was a great writer and an inspiring preacher, but because his striking personality was the earthly centre and source of a diffusive spiritual influence which has touched the hearts and widened the thoughts not merely of Unitarians, but of all the religious thinkers of Christendom. This great position, far higher than that of any living archbishop, would hardly have been attainable apart from the personal fascination with which he was naturally endowed. But this, though an essential factor, was far from being the most important element in the power which he exercised. His deep reverence and profound piety, his intense, all-absorbing interest in religion, his intellectual keenness and grasp, his wide and thorough culture, his mastery of English, his witchery of style and his untiring industry all help to explain his influence. But after all, there was something more, which not only cannot be measured, or weighed, or analysed, but cannot be even named.

Men like Dean Stanley, and Farrar, and Fremantle, and Clifford, felt that the life in which they were one with Martineau was greater than the definitions as to which they differed. And so it came to pass that as the later writings of the deceased saint and philosopher issued from the press, they were welcomed with eagerness and even reverence by men who in another age would have hesitated to regard a Unitarian as a Christian brother.

But, no doubt, some of this favour was due to a strain of noble conservatism in Dr. Martineau's intellect. Whatever might be his readiness to follow rational criticism wherever it had feet to travel safely, he spoke and wrote as one who regards the consciousness of personal relations between God and man as above criticism. If ever he showed a warmth bordering on intolerance in friendly discussion, it was in condemnation of any pantheistic effacement of the personality of God. In him the defenders of the faith in a real Divine fatherhood felt they had an Achilles whom no opponent could match. We all know that there were brave men before Achilles. But after Martineau, who remains equal to the height of this great argument?

From "The Methodist Times."

"I have always been a teacher; I have not ceased to be a learner; in the one capacity I must tell the little that I know, in the other I must strive after some glimpse of the immeasurable light beyond."

In such words, in the preface to his great work, "Types of Ethical Theory,' did the greatest thinker British Noncon formity has ever produced express the secret of his life when the writer had lived almost fourscore years. Through that long period, and for fifteen years afterwards, James Martineau followed, without hesitation and with perfect sincerity, the light of truth, and not the light of truth only, but the light of love also. Very beautiful is the dedication of that great work mentioned above, beautiful in its simplicity, beautiful in its nobility: "In gratitude to my teachers, of whatever age or school, I dedicate this work to the pupils whom during fifty years I have brought to sit at their feet, in the pure search for truth."

. . . . .

In the brief space at my disposal it is impossible to do more than indicate in the baldest fashion the great life-work that Dr. Martineau accomplished, or the immense service he rendered to the cause of all that is lovely and true and honourable and of good report. His own beautiful words, quoted above, contain in the briefest and most lucid form the secret of his greatness and his strength. He worshipped truth. His first intellectual training was scientific. Had he continued his early pursuits he might have become the greatest engineer of an age unique in its engineering triumphs. But the God whom he served had higher and nobler work for him to do. Science is essentially materialistic, and, in the pursuit of scientific studies, Dr. Martineau's mind might never have escaped from its fetters or from the twilight dungeon of science. He might have remained, where so many of the greatest intellects of the century remained, in the slough of phenomena. But his sincerity, his teachableness, his devotion to truth, guided him out of the darkness, led him to the mountain-tops of reality. From that serene height, in a long and calm old age, this great teacher, in his closing years, illumined and cheered his struggling fellow-men.

. . . . .

He, as none other did, united profound thought with an intense spirituality of life. Parts of his theology seem to us truncated; he lived and died a Unitarian, and to a Methodist Unitarianism appears cold. But James Martineau was a spiritual and intellectual giant. Clear, however, as was his spiritual vision, he, too, on earth, saw through a glass darkly. To-day he sees and knows as he is known. Truly a just man and a great, who has left humanity the poorer for his absence. To the end he "followed the gleam." Would that there were more to follow it as faithfully as he did.

Mr. I. M. Wade, in a letter to "The Eastern Daily Press."

His striking personality and commanding ability, though it might at first lead to something akin to awe on approaching him, soon wore off by his genial courtesy, friendly smile, and cordial shake of the hand. The light of his full, deep-set, beautiful eyes shone like the bright sunshine of an April day when they flashed out upon you, and the smile on his grand and expressive countenance that followed was most fascinating when it lit up the grave and scholarly thoughtfulness that in repose usually rested there. As superintendents of the Sunday-school we had much in common. In all he did he was one of the most methodical and order-loving men I ever knew. He seemed as if he would reduce thought and everything else to a rational and well-defined system, and the rules he laid down for the working of the schools and other institutions connected with the chapel were perfect in theory; the only difficulty being to find persons wise, capable, and loyal enough practically to carry them out. There never was anything in the least approaching to dogmatism or imperiousness in the expression of his opinions or in the statement of his views, but one often felt as if overpowered for the time by the sheer weight of his reasoning. Though his own thoughts and conversation were always clothed in a pure and beautiful spirit of humility, he was never averse, but quite the contrary, to listen to the opinions of others, crude though they might be, if honestly and courteously expressed.

It was to me a study and delight to see him presiding over the College Students' Debating Society. How I have seen his grave face lit up and heard his clear silvery voice ring out with hearty laughter at the relation of some humorous anecdote or witty sally, and I once saw him indulging to the full in the wit and humour of a well-known comic song, which was being admirably sung at a social meeting by a member of his congregation. His summing up as president of the students' debates, and his observations which followed, were a treat to listen to. Crabbe Robinson, Henry Morley, and others well known in literature, would often attend these debates, and though I was not a student I had always the privilege of being present as often as I could. Over and over again we used to exclaim amongst ourselves, "What a Judge Dr. Martineau would have made!" He was a source of constant fascination to us, whether we heard him from the pulpit or the platform.

There have been several portraits made of him by eminent artists, Watts amongst others; but that of Emslie is the one I like far away the best. "You who know him so well," said the artist to me one day, "tell me how I shall paint him!" "Next to his inspiration in the pulpit," I said, "I like best to see him when over his grave, thoughtful, and wonderfully expressive face there appears the dawn of a smile playing upon it, at something said or something done which interested him for the moment." Emslie has exactly caught this expression.

From "The New Age."

There is no other word than "charm" to describe the effect of a conversation with Dr. Martineau. Of his preaching and lecturing it might be true that one needed no common powers of perception and persistent attention to follow all the way. It was less so in his impromptu addresses and not at all the case in his private talks. The same habits of clear precision and of symmetrical expression were there, and the personal note made all natural and easy. His eloquent eyes flashed intelligence into you. He talked with the quickest perception of his friend's changes of thought and mood, and was at home with one so easily that one was soon at home with him. There were few things that he more enjoyed, I should say, than a good talk. I remember his attack upon the tobacco-pipe as a foe to conversation. I had ventured to suggest that when host and guest had lit up together they were at once more chum-like and sociable. He wouldn't hear of it. He complained that, whereas when he and Tennyson were walking about through the Surrey heather the poet was vivacious and communicative, once he got home and put pipe between teeth you couldn't get a word from him. He laughed at the notion of Carlyle and Tennyson spending a silent hour together smoking at Cheyne Row; it probably seemed to him a waste of good opportunities. Perhaps, however, they "thought the more."

It was not only with the big minds that he liked to foregather. I remember his saying with evident sincerity that he never went away from the home of the poor or the bedside of the sick whom he visited except with a feeling that it was he who had been comforted and cheered. He had a kindly way with him that was all the more noticeable to those who knew something of the severity and inflexibility of his inner life. He was the last teacher to be deceived by a pupil's specious verbosity, just as he was the first to detect the lurking fallacy in a train of philosophical or theological argument, whether its author were a Spencer, a Huxley, or a Newman. But nothing could exceed his gentle and encouraging sympathy with loyal effort, however misled into error. I knew a young fellow, dead many years since, who was the oddest mixture of logical keenness, philosophy, self-conceit, and genial fun conceivable. He had the supremest contempt for the common rules of health, as well as for the slow methods of studious investigation. By some flash of intuition, I suppose—it could hardly have been by regular study—my friend had mastered Hegel, and he meant to give the world the key to the idealist philosophy one of those days. Alas! he and his essay are gone. Dr. Martineau used to go and sit with this strange genius and chat with him like a brother. It was one out of innumerable touches of a wise man's universal sympathy.

Men read his works—they are very largely read in orthodox clerical circles, and especially in Scotland—but he wistfully looked for practical signs of their sympathy. I think it was the last time I called to see him, on quite a trivial matter—but it gave me an excuse for a memorable chat—he was accompanying me to the door when suddenly he stopped and said with a tone of deep feeling, "I am greatly troubled with the state of things in the country." I looked at him in silence, not knowing whether it was politics or social matters that was in his mind. He went on, "I receive again and again from men in the Church up and down the land letters about my writings, expressing agreement with my views, and yet they continue to say and do the old things; and not one of them will stir a finger to get them altered!" It is so. The New Reformation which he has helped to further is in fact upon us. Men no longer believe what the creeds meant and the liturgies say. And yet the Church and the Prayer Book remain as if things had not altered, and thoughtful people are growing more alienated from the whole system every day. I parted reverently and sadly from my venerable friend—but not without hope. He has not lived and taught in vain.

SOME THOUGHTS ON RUSKIN.

Yet once more has a great prophet been taken from us, the last remaining of the giants of our time. It is well for us to ask ourselves, "What did Ruskin stand for to us? How has he influenced us, and changed our life, and stimulated our thought?" The debt we most willingly and easily acknowledge is the debt of pleasure. To how many of us in middle age must the hours come back when in early youth we read and marvelled over such chapters as "The Mountain Glory," when we followed, only half understanding and yet enchanted, the vision which was as that of a new heaven and new earth. But years and experience present a great teacher under new aspects. We become more and more concerned in what he has to tell us of God and man. I think Ruskin once said of Claude Lorraine, after having pointed out what he felt as his faults and limitations, "But at any rate he set the sun in heaven for us;" and in a parallel sense we may say of Ruskin, "At any rate he set God in the world for us." We all know the severity of the world to theoretic atheism, yet we are daily assailed all of us by the far more subtle temptation to practical atheism, and against this Ruskin spent his life in fighting, and from his store-house we may get the finest weapons to turn the foe to flight. As an instance of what I mean by theoretic atheism take Shelley. He was called, and he called himself, an atheist; yet he wrote in "Prometheus Unbound":—

For what could it avail to bid thee gaze
On the revolving world? What to bid speak
Fate, Time, Occasion, Chance, and Change?
To these
All things are subject but eternal Love.

Then take Napoleon. I never heard that he called himself an atheist—indeed, I should imagine that he had too shrewd an appreciation of the negotiable value of conventional religion, but he made (or is reported to have made) that most atheistical speech: "Heaven is on the side of the big battalions." So Ruskin himself says somewhere—I think it is in "Val d'Arno"—"There are pious Christians and impious Christians, pious Turks and impious Turks, pious Infidels and impious Infidels." Religion with Ruskin was not this or that dogma or observance, but a faithful living in the light and in the law of God from first to last, in every concern of life. In his long examination of Dante's landscape in "Modern Painters," he gives us a picture of life which might be not out of place as his own epitaph:

The active life which has only the service of man for its end, and therefore gathers flowers, with Leah, for its own decoration, is indeed happy, but not perfectly so; it has only the happiness of the dream, belonging essentially to the dream of human life, and passing away with it. But the active life which labours for the more and more discovery of God's work is perfectly happy, and is the life of the terrestrial paradise, being a true foretaste of heaven, and beginning in earth, as heaven's vestibule.

It was in such a spirit that Ruskin approached beauty, both natural and artistic, and such a spirit makes the worship of beauty sane and safe and keeps it pure from ignoble elements. As a teacher Ruskin said many startling and some hard sayings. His use of hyperbole, according as it is understood, is a delight or a bewilderment. He gives rules and counsels too hard for us to follow. But what teacher who is a real power in the world does not command impossibilities? The only faithful acceptance of them is the more or less feeble groping in the way they lead, and this may help to gradually emancipate our souls from that vulgarity which is "a form of death." One result of trying to follow Ruskin is surely that we take life more at first hand and live more directly in touch with realities. Too many of us live the life of a hermit-crab, sheltering ourselves in some alien shell of convention or tradition, till in religion, in politics, in domestic and social life, we are not living, but drifting—not feeling, or knowing, or enjoying, or seeing (or only feebly), without one direct genuine personal impulse. And this means loss not only to ourselves, but to the world; for every individual soul can see and feel for itself things that no other soul can see and feel in precisely the same way.

How much Ruskin has tried to teach us about travel. Remember his beautiful description of old-fashioned journeying:—

The olden days of travelling, now to return no more, in which distance could not be vanquished without toil, but in which that toil was rewarded partly by the power of deliberate survey of the countries through which the journey lay, and partly by the happiness of the evening hours, when, from the top of the last hill he had surmounted, the traveller beheld the quiet village where he had to rest, scattered among the meadows beside its valley stream; or from the long-hoped-for turn in the dusty perspective of the causeway, saw for the first time the towers of some famed city, faint in the rays of sunset; hours of peaceful and thoughtful pleasure for which the rush of the arrival at the railway station is, perhaps, not always, or to all men an equivalent.

Ruskin knew that such things were past, but may we not strive to keep in our own journeyings some reflection of the peace and joy he knew? This needs effort and choice, but it is a thing to be perpetually aimed at.

The Manchester Guardian, in its admirable life of Ruskin, refers to a complaint that has been made of his want of definite rules and maxims: "It is often said of Ruskin, as of Carlyle, that his teaching does not direct the reader to any definite course of conduct. The statement is true, but it is no disparagement; for as Professor Norton remarks, 'While no special rules of conduct can suit the case of each person in a miscellaneous audience, there is no one who may not be profited by the quickening of his sympathies and the elevation of his moral standards.' Mr. Ruskin, as a moralist, sounds a bugle-call to the individual conscience."

As to Ruskin's political economy, its main principles were admirably summed up in an address which was presented to him by a large body of his admirers at Christmas in the year 1885:—

1. That political economy can furnish sound laws of national life and work only when it respects the dignity and moral destiny of man. 2. That the wide use of wealth in developing a complete human life is of incomparably greater moment, both to men and nations, than its production or accumulation, and can alone give these any vital significance. 3. That honourable performance of duty is more truly just than rigid enforcement of right; and that not in competition but in helpfulness, not in self-assertion but in reverence, is to be found the power of life.

These principles will lead us far, and in proportion as we live in their spirit are we raising a memorial to Ruskin—the only one that he would care for. Many may wish that he were laid to rest in Westminster Abbey, but it was right that his own wishes should be respected. These were that he might be buried near to the place where he died. "He added that if ever in his excursions among the Alps he should slip on a glacier and be killed, he would like to be left there with just the snow to cover him." Many when they read this must have thought,—

Here—here's his place, where meteors shoot, clouds form,
Lightnings are loosened,
Stars come and go! Let joy break with the storm,
Peace let the dew send!
Lofty designs must close in like effects:
Loftily lying,
Leave him—still loftier than the world suspects,
Living and dying.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES FOR INQUIRERS IN RELIGION.—IV.

We have been dwelling on a little group of principles which endeavour to express the conditions on which the progressive growth of truth depends. The fourth and last of these now comes under our notice.

Some observers have supposed that the ceaseless conflict and confusion among religious and other beliefs proves that truth can never be attained by man. This is only to apply to all our spiritual life on its intellectual side, a mode of criticism which is constantly applied in particular cases: as when the defenders of the "orthodox" view of the Bible speak about the "discordant theories of the so-called Higher Critics." The assumption seems to be that if those who are investigating the truth in any branch of inquiry disagree in their methods or conclusions, they are proved to be pursuing an illusion. This assumption is not only false as a matter of fact and experience; it is absurd, from the nature of our intelligence. The attainment of truth would be impossible without this mutual struggle. Of Truth, as of Goodness, we may say sub pondere crescit—its growth is only possible through strife and opposition overcome. The higher ethical teaching of to-day—which is that of Christianity from the beginning—shows that the victory of Goodness comes through its work in transforming evil: not annihilating the evil but, as it were, rearranging the energy and turning it to good purposes, "unmaking to remake." What Christian thinkers have called Love is the root and vital principle of all the highest human goodness. And this living Love which is Divine, the Love which is ever bearing, believing, hoping, enduring, rejoicing not in iniquity but rejoicing in the truth—the Love which not only can do this but must needs do it—could never come to be but for the sufferings, sins, mistakes, and conflicts of life: while yet it is ever overcoming these and turning them to good. So Truth is in its own way a transforming power which can be realised only through the conflict of partial truths. This has been finely said by Professor Pfleiderer. To learn from History aright, we need "an insight, penetrating through the confused play of outward events into the reality of men and things, into the deep thoughts which are the controlling motives underlying even the apparent discord of individual passions; we need an unprejudiced appreciation of the necessity even of the oppositions and conflicts, the errors and passions of men, because, as Hegel says, with Heracleitus, strife is the father of all things, and only through the strife of partial rights and one-sided truths can the whole truth of God struggle into existence; we need an intelligent reverence for the heroic figures in history, in whom is embodied the genius of nations or ages, who as instruments of a higher power have roused the thought slumbering in the souls of all, have given it clear expression, and in mighty deed have summoned it to life." Renan has scarcely stated the case too strongly when he says: "History is the philosophy of this century. Our century cares little for metaphysical or logical analysis; its great concern is history, and above all the history of the human intellect. Here lies the dividing-point of the schools; a man believes in Humanity or does not believe in it, according to the idea which he has formed of its history. If the history of the human mind be only a succession of systems which have upset one another, all that we can do is to throw ourselves into the arms of Scepticism or into those of blind Faith or Credulity. If the history of the human intellect be the onward march to the truth through oscillations which have the effect of restricting more and more the domain of error, we we are justified in still putting our trust in Reason."*

The conflict, then, is not between truth and error, but between partial truths, each mingled with partial errors; and in every case, we need to find a point of view above both the conflicting principles, from which to criticise them—that is, we need a principle containing more truth than either. Were it not for their conflict and opposition, the higher principle could never emerge. This or that individual man may indeed despair of real knowledge, falling back on scepticism or credulity; but human Reason is possessed of immortal energy, and attacks its problems again and ever again, with undying, irresistible confidence in itself and its power of attaining to real knowledge at last.

If every conflict of beliefs is really a conflict between truth mixed with error on the one side, and truth mixed with error on the other likewise, it follows that very often the most instructive criticism of beliefs will be simply to compare them; and experience verifies this. Sometimes it is most instructive to set different views side by side and contrast them. It has been well said that there is no better way of understanding a belief than by considering its opposite, or what it denies. We do not fully appreciate what it affirms until we have worked out in detail what it denies.

* "L'Avenir de la Science," ch. xv. If Renan had worked out many of the thoughts suggested in this early work, his subsequent intellectual career would have been very different.

If now we try to put into one question the essence of our modern demand upon religious thought—the point which is the focus of all prevailing perplexities—the question will be this: What or where is the depository of truth or certainty? What can we definitely rely upon? If we could reach this "Seat of Authority" and rest upon it, we should know where we are; but as it is, the various religious bodies not only are ignorant of their real position, but are almost afraid to inquire into it. To some minds, perhaps, the outcome of the doctrines on which we have been dwelling—that Truth always has degrees, is always growing from less to more in History, and at the best is stained by error—will seem far from satisfactory. They will appear to imply that everything must be left an open question. It is well to have a general trust in Reason; but if everything is thus left an "indeterminate equation," the old question recurs, where is the Seat of Authority? Whatever form of belief we may accept, it would seem to be a blind bargain—a leap in the dark.

If by "leaving everything an open question" the objector means, "concluding that no one may go to work by the light of his own private reason and conscience," drawing up a catalogue of statements, theological, ethical, or philosophical, which shall be inviolable certainties, then truly we have left everything "open." Such "certainty," affirmative or negative, is intellectually absurd and ethically undesirable. We can reach only what is relatively the most true for us. Truth, like goodness, is a growing power in our race; and neither of them can be pursued save by penetrating to the heart of what man has already accomplished, in the accumulation of moral ideas and ideals, or of intellectual beliefs and systems. No one but a prophet, introducing a new movement into the world, has the right to seek them in any other way. Only one who tries to detach himself from the spiritual streams of tendency in humanity, is trying to take a "leap in the dark." He seeks to set up reason and conscience, in the particular forms which they have taken in himself, as absolute judges and critics of the general spiritual life of humanity; while in reality it is this progressive life of humanity which penetrates and partly creates his individual personality, with all its habits of thought and feeling. A great spiritual heritage has come down to us. We know that it is a growth of truth and error together; hence we need to develop its contents into forms which, when judged by the wider experience of to-day, contain more truth or express more reality, and principles, such as those which we have been considering, are the natural furniture of reason for doing this. Our experience must be in every direction deep as well as wide, and our Reason powerful enough to grasp its meaning,—and sympathetic enough to reach the heart of what in the past was thought to be the meaning of experience and has come down to us as "true belief." Experience and its rational interpretation—these two inseparable factors, ever variable yet ever progressive—constitute the basis of human knowledge.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN OLIVER, J.P.

THE town of Shrewsbury has suffered a serious loss, which will be most deeply felt by the High-street Free Christian Church, of which he was a devoted member, in the sudden death of Mr. Councillor John Oliver, J.P., which occurred at Birmingham on Thursday, Jan. 18. Mr. Oliver, who had been for many years foreman to Messrs. Phillips, tailors, of High-street, was a native of Shrewsbury, and a genuine working-man, who had made for himself a high position of public usefulness and honour. In 1890 he was for the first time elected a member of the Town Council, and was the first working-man to be made a magistrate of the borough (in 1893). Mr. Oliver was one of the pioneers of the local Co-operative Society, he was a member of the Order of Foresters, and as a volunteer was at the time of his death a quartermaster-sergeant of the 1st Salop Rifles. He was one of the warmest advocates of the adoption of the Free Libraries Act, and was a member of the Library Committee.

The funeral on Monday week was of a semi-military character, and was attended by the Mayor and Corporation and many other representative men. The service in High-street Church was conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street, who, in the course of his address, said that he spoke in sorrow, but not without a gleam of thankfulness and joy. That gathering was of those who had known and loved and honoured John Oliver, who lived among them a useful, an honourable, and a manly life, and who had left the marks of his life upon great numbers of his fellow-citizens. He should not speak as though John Oliver belonged alone to that Church; he remembered that he belonged to a larger fellowship, that he was of the fellowship of all good and true men, and was of the Church which included all the children of God that were seeking after Him in simplicity and holiness and truth. Their friend belonged to the people; he sprang from them; he lived among them, he worked for them, and he did his best to enrich their lives, to raise them and to draw them into true citizenship, real manhood, and Divine sanctity. He was the friend of all classes; he was an intermediary between the workers and those above them, and he suffered many an asperity, cleared away many a difficulty, and was, indeed, a true helper and true worker for the better life of the community in which he lived. The conclusion of the service at the cemetery was also conducted by Mr. Street, and on Sunday a memorial service was held in High-street Church.

MR. SETH IBBETSON.

AFTER sixteen years of great suffering, Mr. Seth Ibbetson, of Bradford, peacefully passed into the higher life on Jan. 19, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. He was the only child of the late Mr. Thomas Ibbetson, one of the founders of the Unitarian Church at Idle, a suburb of Bradford. Like his father, Mr. Ibbetson was an earnest and enlightened Unitarian, and was at one time an acceptable lay preacher in connection with the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. He was interred at the Undercliffe Cemetery on Tuesday, the 23rd, his minister, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, officiating. In the course of a short address delivered in the house, Mr. Jones said: "We are assembled here to-day, not altogether as mourners, but as those who feel thankful that God, in His infinite mercy, has at last released our friend from his sufferings. Death did not come to him as a king of terrors, but as a welcome messenger from the heavenly Father. Mr. Ibbetson was the good son of a good father, and so long as his health permitted he made himself useful in many ways. He was one of the most zealous defenders of the faith which he professed that I ever knew, and owing to his extensive acquaintance with our best literature he was always ready to give a reason for the hope there was in him. He often told me that his religion had been a source of unspeakable comfort to him during his long and painful illness, and that were it not for his absolute trust in the goodness of God he did not think he could have borne his sufferings. He could truly say: 'Yea! though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me.' Like the Master in whose steps he followed, he was made perfect through sufferings. His patience and resignation have been beautiful to witness; and we shall long remember him as a man who lived in closest communion with his Maker."

MR. THOMAS HENRY BIGGS, J.P.

IN Mr. T. H. Biggs the congregation of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, has lost one more of its staunch and faithful supporters. He was in his usual place there on Sunday, Jan. 14, and no one had reason to suppose that he would not be a regular attender for many further years. But at the end of that week he had a slight slip which resulted in a fracture to one of his legs, and in a little more than a week he succumbed to the nervous shock thus caused. Early in the morning of Monday last he passed peacefully away. He leaves a widow and three children, and his loss is lamented by a large circle of friends and acquaintances. His disposition was most amiable and gentle, and in public life he was as much respected as he was beloved in private.

Mr. Biggs was head of the firm of Higson and Biggs, cotton spinners, Westhoughton. He was a magistrate for the Salford Hundred of Lancashire, vice-president of the Liberal Association of the Westhoughton Division, trustee of Bank-street Chapel, and was for many years an active member of the Council of the Bolton Girls' High School, in connection with which he did much good service. He was a member of an old Leicester family, one of whom, the late Mr. John Biggs, was for many years M.P. for Leicester.

The funeral took place on Wednesday morning at Deane Church, where there was a very large attendance of private friends and public representatives, in addition to the family circle. The service was conducted by the vicar, the Rev. H. S, Patterson, M.A., the lesson being read, through the courtesy of the vicar, by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., who also conducted the service at the graveside.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Thy Will be Done."—I.

No words of prayer have gone more deeply into the life of man than these. Those who have learnt to trust in God as their Father, and to be glad in the thought of His great love and holiness, must pray that His will may be done. Sometimes it is with joy in the strength of what is right and good, knowing that this is the will of God, which we can help to do; sometimes it is with trustful bearing of very sorrowful and dreadful things, because all the same we know His will is best. Of that I shall try to speak to you next week; but now let us think of the first meaning.

It seems to me just taking home to ourselves more closely and more earnestly the prayer, "Thy Kingdom come." We think of what is wrong and evil in the world, and desire that it should all be set right, like the good order of a home in which truth and right and love always rule. Then the world would be ordered as God's Kingdom, and if it were so, His will would be done, as it is done in heaven. So we pray, "Thy Kingdom come," and remembering that we must set about doing our part, to make the good order of the heavenly life here on earth, we go on to pray, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." And truly to pray that prayer is to feel with all our heart that we really want to be doing our Father's will. It is a rousing of ourselves to be brave and faithful and persevering to do what we know is right, simply because it is right, and we know we ought, and with the strong and joyful feeling that it is our Father's will, that He has made us able to do it.

You all of you know what a difference it makes at home if you have been selfish and disobedient; how wretched you feel, how everything seems to have gone wrong and the whole day is spoilt; and then how perfectly different it is, when you have said you are sorry, and set about doing better; you know, when you are doing right, even when it is hard work, how glad you feel, how strong and eager to be more helpful still; and it seems to make music in your heart, the house is full of sunshine, there is nothing that can make you happier in all the world. So it is in the larger home which God has given us, that we should all live together in it, as His children. Duty is the first great word of life for everyone. And the wonderful gladness that comes to us in doing our duty, even if we have to suffer dreadful things, for the sake of the right, that strange feeling of being strong and ready, and able to conquer all difficulties, is given to us as a sign that this is our Father's will, and that He is with us, helping us to be brave and true. That makes us understand what is meant by His will being done "on earth as it is in heaven." In the joy of duty bravely done there is for us the beginning of heaven here on earth; for with that joy comes the love of what is true and good, and so the love of our Father, whose will is thus made clear to us. It is love which makes our homes, and it makes our home with God, our Father, in this beautiful world,—love strong in duty. Duty is the first great word, made perfect in Love.

I hope many of you have read the story of William Tyndale, as it has been beautifully told by Miss Cooke. He was one of the noblest of Englishmen, who lived in the time of Henry VII. and Henry VIII., and was the first to translate the New Testament into English, and to print the book, so that all the people should be able to read for themselves about the life and teaching of Jesus. It was a dangerous thing to do in those days, because the King and the rulers of the Church were against it, and men were put to death for teaching religion in any way that the Church and the King did not approve. But Tyndale knew that it ought to be done, so that all the people might be able to learn and judge for themselves, and be better Christians, and doers of the Father's will. He would not be frightened away from his duty, but for years worked patiently at his translation, and then, because it could not be done in England, went over to Germany and got the first English New Testament printed there, and then went on steadily working to get the whole Bible translated and printed in English. At last, while he was living at Antwerp, he was betrayed into the hands of his enemies and put to death; but he had known all the time that that might happen. All those years of his life were a brave and noble prayer to God, "Thy will be done"—for he knew it was God's will that the work should be done, and he put his whole strength into doing it. Though he suffered many hardships, and at last a cruel death, there was surely a great joy in his heart, the light of heaven would be about him even in prison and on the scaffold, because he had done the Father's will.

Another man whose life was for many years the same brave and patient prayer, though in a different way, was John Howard, the reformer of English prisons. Most of you, I expect, know about him, how he was horrified at the terrible condition in which prisoners were kept in those days, and how he went about for years, giving himself no rest, shrinking from no danger in going into the most dreadful places, to find out the exact truth, and then made it known, and so compelled Parliament to put an end to the worst evils. It is now more than a hundred years since Howard died of fever which he caught in a Russian prison that he was visiting, but he is always to be remembered for his noble work; and I want you to feel how truly he was praying all through those years, "Thy will be done," and how through his faithful and unselfish labours God's will was done in that one matter as it had not been done before.

With those two great examples of Englishmen, think also of Jesus himself, how his life was given up to helping his fellow-men, and so doing the Father's will, and how he was faithful even unto death; and then remember that these great examples are to teach us all, so that we also in our daily lives may be faithful, whether we are children or elders, and learn more and more truly to pray "Thy will be done." Remember that it is just taking more closely to yourself the prayer about the Kingdom—that wherever you are, at home or at school, or in playtimes, with others or by yourselves, you can be doing the Father's will, and that is what you ought to do. The boy who keeps to honour and truthfulness, even though others may laugh at him and use him roughly, is bravely praying that prayer, and he will be glad and thankful that he had the courage. So everyone who keeps from meanness, and patiently does little acts of kindness, and is cheerful and unselfish, even when no one seems to notice much; everyone who works steadily and honestly, to help on the good order of the world; everyone who speaks a brave word or does a fearless deed in defence of the helpless or to help the weak and suffering; everyone who does any duty, faithfully and with love of what is pure and true and good, is praying "Father, Thy will be done," and so is getting a firmer hold on the true life, with the strength and joy and love which will be perfected in heaven.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Psalms of the West.

Rejoice, ye children of the divine; lift up your voices, ye sons of the Everlasting.

Live in the joy of His countenance, O my people, and delight in the wisdom of His creation, the glory that encircleth the heavens, and the loving-kindness of His infinite love.

He resteth not from hour to hour; He offereth salvation from the beginning to the end of the world.

Every soul doth He call to his labour; every conscience doth He bless with perception.

He looketh for the guileless to protect them from evil; He longeth for the poor to seek righteous knowledge, that they may rise from their heavy distress.

He remindeth the prosperous of imperishable things; He calleth them again and again to forsake vanity, and to animate the multitude with reason.

He rewardeth the worker with peace, the temperate judgment with security, and the self-denying with pleasure of bestowal.

Full of beauty and aspiration are the thoughts of the righteous, the strong souls whose wings are lustrous with touches of hope.

Great is the power of man to love Thee, to worship Thee, to glorify the high Unseen.

Lovely is the sacrifice of the saints, who gave every sweet comfort to the fire, and died that we might better believe Thy will.

Round about Thy throne is everlasting strength, and from Thy kingdom shall the kingdoms of the earth be nourished.

Thou shalt find justice where oppression was strong, and equality where the guilty were princes.

Thou shalt pour freedom on the nations that groaned, and healthful intelligence on the people that trembled in darkness.

The cruel shall be turned to mercy, and in the spring of graciousness the churlish shall open his heart.

The mean shall be lifted up in the zeal of the noble, and the weary ones shall sing unto Thee in the worship of Thy courts.

Mighty shall be the will of the least of the children of faith, exalted the honour of the humblest among the loving.

Surely the seen is an image, and the unseen alone hath power; the invisible hath created, and remaineth for ever; though the fixed stars be melted and moulded anew.

We will not mourn for death, we will pass to Thy presence with thanksgiving, and our lives shall be hymns of gladness ascending to the home of souls.

MEN FOR THE MINISTRY.

THE report of the annual meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, which we published last week, contained more than one brief reference to a matter which has occupied the serious attention of the Visitors and other of the most faithful friends of the College and of our Free Churches for some time past. In the Address of the College Committee, this matter is taken up and dealt with at considerable length. The Committee refer with satisfaction and good hope to the new departure in the establishment of a common residence for the students, attached to the College, and welcome the prospect of fuller classrooms and an enlarged College life; and yet they add that the hopes with which the removal to Oxford was associated have been only partially fulfilled. Where the disappointment of those hopes has been specially marked the Professors pointed out in their report at the close of the previous session, and the Committee adopt their statement in order to urge it upon the attention of all friends of the College, quoting the following passage:—

> At the end of ten years at Oxford, we have extremely few academical distinctions to record. Our men, we rejoice to believe, bear a good character in the University; but, in the present day, purity of character is not sufficient for the work which we have to accomplish, and if we are to do our share in maintaining an enlightened faith, we must have men with high intellectual power and depth of spiritual insight. Our students are being drawn less and less from the old Nonconformist families, and, while we gladly welcome the able and excellent men who have not grown up among us, we cannot but regard it as a sign of religious decay when a community fails to produce its own ministry. Friends have poured material gifts into our College with lavish generosity. Will they give us the sons of cultured homes, strong in intelligence, of consecrated purpose, and glad to take whatever outward things may come, if only they may devote their lives to a self-denying ministry of pure and undefiled religion?

Taking up this eloquent appeal, the Committee call attention to the need thus indicated, and refer to one special ground for better hope in the near future, as follows:—

> There is a distinct need, for the College, of students who shall raise high its standard of scholarship, as well as bring with them to their studies deep devotion to the principles and traditions which the College enshrines. For such students the College looked in the past, and looked not in vain, to sons of the old leading Nonconformist families referred to by the Professors. How is it that the supply is not maintained? The Committee are afraid that, excellent in many ways as is the influence of the great public schools, the fact that the old private Nonconformist Academies are now a thing of the past has some relation to the circumstances lamented, not alone by the Professors but by all who have the interest of the College, and of the ministry trained within it, at heart. In these Academies, frequented by boys of Presbyterian descent, the old traditions lived and the old religious atmosphere breathed; and the young men passed from them in close touch with the religious life and interests of the Free Churches of which these Schools thus became nurseries. The public schools, on the other hand, are under Church of England influences, and the Nonconformist youths raised in them, if they are not thereby drawn into the Establishment, are often rendered indifferent to the religion of their fathers. If this be in any degree a correct diagnosis of at least one of the causes of the failure of the community most closely connected with the College to supply its own ministry, the Committee look with hope to the opening, next September, of the new Willaston School, whose establishment, under the Will of the late Mr. Barker, was chronicled in the last Report.
> Willaston School is based on the same principle as the College, for the teaching of religion without dogmatic limitations, the greatest importance being attached to this element in the school curriculum; and it is hoped that, being conducted on the best public school lines, Willaston may be a means of retaining under influences, of which the College is the foremost exponent and custodian, the rising generations from the Non-subscribing Churches.
> The Committee of the College look to this new departure in public school education with high hope and deep interest, and they trust that it may be so supported, not alone with funds, but with the more precious gift of the sons from cultured Nonconformist homes, and from others in sympathy with an education religious yet unsectarian, that new religious life may be breathed into the youth of the community whose ministry it is the function of the College to train. The Committee believe that the old educational influence of the Academies of past days may be hereby revived on broader lines; and it is their earnest hope and prayer that, under it, a new inspiration may descend on many of the new generations that will arise in the Non-subscribing Churches, and that it may lead them, as in olden days, to dedicate themselves to the ministry of a community endeared to them not alone by inheritance and tradition, but by the teaching and associations of those school days which always do so much to fix the tenour of the whole life. In their onward look to the future, the Committee see in the Willaston School a new and hopeful recruiting ground for the classrooms of the College, and for that unfettered ministry of religion for whose education the College exists.
> Not that this school will take from parents or from ministers any of their special responsibility. The Committee make an earnest appeal to both for the renewed exertion upon the young placed in their charge of that strong and deep religious influence, the outcome of which should surely be the devotion of many young lives to the ministry of the religion in which they have been nurtured in home and Church, but also the dedication of many others to the higher life of "sobriety, earnestness, intelligence and piety," lifted above the floods of worldly engagements and temptations into the devotion of heart and soul and mind to the service of the living God.

This statement and appeal we desire here to leave for the earnest consideration of our readers, and would only add one other thought as to what is required if men of culture and standing in the world are to be attracted to the ministry of our Free Churches. We certainly share the hope that Willaston School may be of very real service in strengthening the hold which the religious life of our churches has upon the young people growing up within their borders; but to make the ministry of our churches attractive as a calling in life to men who are free to devote themselves to the highest ambitions of this world, it appears to us that one thing, and one thing only, is needed. Not a more assured worldly position for the ministry (desirable on many grounds as that may be); not the attraction of large salaries and "prizes in the profession"—for when has genuine religious ardour been guided by such considerations? The men of true prophetic spirit in every ministry have cheerfully embraced a life of poverty, where need be, leaving often distinguished positions and homes of material abundance to endure hardness among the poor and outcast of the world. What is needed is to make the ministry felt in its spiritual power, in its influence on the world, as essentially noble, as appointed of GOD to the highest ends. The wealth of our people may be poured without stint into the worthy provision of churches and all the apparatus of Church work—the giving of our people for such purposes has never yet been commensurate with the ideal of the Church's place and duty in the world; but what is yet more needed is personal devotion to the service of the Church on the part of the people, whose worship and whose work must make its strength, and on whom is laid the duty of maintaining a faithful ministry, not merely by educating men and providing means for their subsistence, but by requiring great things of them, by honouring their calling with the highest honour, and by loyal personal co-operation in consecrated service proving that great things can be accomplished for God and man.

When it is manifest that the religious life of our churches is instinct with the spirit of lofty enthusiasm, and avails greatly in the service of the Kingdom of God, and on that account attracts to its communion a growing strength of devotion and new-comers who continually enlarge its range of blessing, then will there be no lack of men, endowed with the highest gifts, who, whatever their position and prospects in the world, will humbly and thankfully dedicate themselves and all they possess to the ministry of those churches, as to a calling the noblest and most blessed the heart of man can conceive.

In Memoriam.

BY THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.*

"Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? . . . The temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.—1 Cor. iii. 16, 17.

"A tall young man, thin, but of vigorous and muscular form, with dark hair, pale but not delicate complexion, a countenance full in repose of thought and in animation of intelligence and enthusiasm; features belonging to no regular type or order of beauty, and yet leaving the impression of a very high kind of beauty; and a voice so sweet, and clear, and strong, without being in the least degree loud, that it conveyed all the inspiration of music without any of its art or intention."

Such, according to the description of one who remembered the young man well, no other than his successor in this pulpit, Charles Wicksteed, was the minister of this congregation nearly seventy years ago. Such was he who was to become the supreme religious and philosophical teacher of the century in his native land.

It is hard to know which it would the more behove us to commemorate this day, in the urgency of our immeasurable loss, the friend, the pastor, the Christian minister, the man who christened some of those who still worship with us, and married others, or the illustrious thinker, the inspired seer, whose thought and faith are woven into the structure of the age and must to all time affect the history of human thinking on the loftiest and most momentous of all themes that can occupy the mind.

* A sermon preached in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, on Sunday morning, January 21st.

But for my part I must be permitted to-day to put aside the more personal and private aspects of our loss, on which one of Dr. Martineau's College pupils and his successor in the pulpit of Hope-street Church could hardly speak with steady voice, and to turn to those larger, if not more sacred, elements of his ministry to mankind with which all the world has rung in the by-gone week.

In James Martineau the world has probably lost a great civil engineer. But there came a day when the lad of seventeen journeyed from the workshop at Derby to the funeral of his young cousin's husband at Nottingham. And standing by the open grave of the Rev. Henry Turner, so moved was he by the affection and veneration there displayed, that he received the impulse himself to join a ministry which could win and confer so rich a blessing. And so he became an engineer of thought and wisdom, constructor of stately bridges between the finite and the infinite, builder of broad and sweeping roadways from the mind of man to the eternal heart of God.

And I would lay it down, as the most overmastering thought that comes to me in these early hours of our vast bereavement, that of all benefactors to mankind, there is none other who can quite rank on a par with him who lays afresh the bases of religious thought in such manner as to give intellectual form and cohesion and consistency to the religious aspirations and emotions of the men of his generation and those who come after him.

Let us in no way derogate from the praise of those whose service to humanity takes other forms. The great inventor showers new convenience and effectiveness of action on the members of society. The great discoverer opens up hidden mysteries of nature, locked since the birth of time in the bosom of the unknown, for the endowment of men with new and undreamed powers over the elements of the world in which they live. The great statesman enlarges the boundaries of human freedom and works towards the brotherhood of nations. The great philanthropist assuages the pangs of human misery and toils that the earth may become more like a garden of the Lord. The great preacher inspires such as his voice can reach with the enthusiasm of goodness, and stores their minds with noble images of the beautiful and the true. But behind all these works the great religious thinker and supplies them with the very ground on which they stand, the very basis of their operations, the very texture of their intellectual and spiritual life. His labours enter into all of theirs, and give them body, force, consistency, and purpose.

It is possible that all this may sound as a mere rhetorical flourish; but I am profoundly convinced that it is true. It may be admitted that but few come directly and immediately under the influence to which I refer. Even here in Hope-street Church there are perhaps not many who have, by actual perusal, received from the great nineteenth-century master the results of his Study of Religion or sought under his guidance the Seat of Authority in Religion. Perhaps few of you could even give a succinct account of the main teaching of those two monumental works. Nevertheless, your own thinking and feeling, your own moral and spiritual life, are profoundly affected by the thinking and the sentiment of James Martineau. And tens of thousands are there, in this and in many lands, on whom that subtle influence works—works often when they do not know it. For he has taught the teachers. Writers and thinkers and preachers scattered over the Churches have inbreathed his inspiration. Their word is coloured by the word quietly writ in Gordon-square or at Aviemore. And through link after link the electric flash has passed to a countless host who know not how that quickening word has changed them.

At any rate for my own part let me make confession that I am well-nigh appalled when I ask myself where I should have been but for the leading and the teaching of James Martineau. Other teachers might indeed have caught my ear. Some master-mind might indeed have loomed out of the darkness to help me to reduce the chaos of my thought to cosmos, the scattered, tangled and confused to order. Somewhere in literature I might have found words to clear the fundamental thinking of my mind, and teach me how to co-ordinate my thoughts of God, of Man, of the Energy moving through the universe, of Human Duty, in such manner that I should have some clear word to say to my fellow-men and could still have been a preacher. But when I look round among the great ones of European and of English letters, I confess I do not see where I should have found this alternative master of wisdom and prophet of God; and it seems to me that I should have been tossed to and fro on unstable billows of speculation, been distracted by a Babel din of voices, been without a helm by which to steer my way over the pathless tracks of thought, and been without a lucid message to declare by tongue or pen.

And it is not the preacher only who needs such guidance. You may have splendid powers of abstract thought and soar high in the empyrean of philosophic speculation, or you may be a man of the market little used to measure out the mysteries of infinity and eternity. But whichever you be, if you are to have religion and straight guidance on the path of duty and help from the unseen in the stern and difficult way of life, it is among your first needs that what thought you have about God and his relations with man should be clear and unconfused. For even as our system of nerve and muscle, the working forces of life, would collapse into a flabby and inert mass, helpless and useless, without the system of bone upon bone branching out from the central column to sustain trunk and limbs and give them shape, so the impulses and aspirations and emotions of the spiritual life die out or run into misshapen excess, unless they be supported and ranged in due co-ordination by some solid column of intellectual conception at the centre. And the age which in its master-minds has no definite and luminous philosophy of religion, will in its average men have no sustained and ordered spiritual energy and ethical enthusiasm.

And so I for one must place the great religious philosopher foremost among the benefactors of mankind.

But the claim of Martineau on the gratitude of the religious world is yet stronger than that of the ordinary religious philosopher. For it has been in a unique crisis of religious thought that he has spoken. For whatever else the Christian century now expiring may be memorable, for this it will be ever memorable: it has been the century in which the credentials of all external authority in religion have finally and for ever broken down. It is true that many men are still engaged in trying to restore them. But they are as children who would build a house of cards to brave the breeze, or so consolidate with their little spades a citadel of sand that it shall repulse the inrolling salt-sea tide. All men awake know that the old credentials from authority of Council or of Book can never be restored. And Martineau has been the man of the century who has known that this was an advance and not a retrogression of religion, who has known that locked in his own breast the child of God holds fast, signed and sealed, the certificate of the Heavenly Fatherhood, who has known that the religious life is a fact of the soul's experience which documentary evidence can neither establish nor destroy, who has called on men to turn inward the eye of faith and there read the apocalypse which declares the eternal moral and spiritual union of humanity with God. I do not say that others have not spoken a like word; but they with faltering speech, he with the clarion note of a prophet assured; they with reasonings which sometimes halted or left breaches in the roadway, he with sustained and consecutive syllogism whose lucid argument ever and anon flashed and glowed with the light of God rekindled in a prophet soul.

So in the great strategy of the battle of faith Martineau seized the psychologic moment, and in the very generation when the loud halloo went up from the enemies of the Churches that neither Church nor Bible could any longer rank as sponsors for God and Conscience and Eternal Life, he stepped forth and said:—"That is so; yet behold! these things are written in characters imperishable across the very soul itself."

And indeed he joined the critics in the chase; joined them in their eager scrutiny of the Christian documents and their argument against the authenticity of such a Gospel or the authority of such a record. He must rank among the foremost in the challenge to the detailed credibility of New Testament accounts, going in this respect even further than many of the freest of us deem that literary evidence compels. But that was but the by-work of his life. His supreme achievement was the demonstration that, let the critics reconstruct History as they will, Religion stands intact, its witnesses and guarantors all marshalled within the very constitution of the human being. If the twentieth century is not to see the overwhelming of faith in the sea of critical negation, if there be promise that faith shall stand forth only the firmer and the fairer, that is in no small measure because the nineteenth century held the life and work and noble inspiration of that veteran thinker whose silver voice once made music in this pulpit.

It is, I think, incumbent, that in this utterance of grateful memory on behalf of the congregation to which James Martineau devoted the great central period of his active life, we should record distinctly the particular services which he rendered to the theory of religion. Those services were dual. On two great main lines he laid the argument which justifies the faith of man in a living God.

His first great argument establishes the Living God as Power, as the eternal source of all the energy that flows through the spaces of the universe, sending the stars on their ordered course, hurling the quivering light athwart the heavens, binding the systems in the embrace of gravitation, sending the life-forces through the plant and the sentient creature, weaving the gossamers across the dewy grass, setting the human nerve athrill with the burden of thought or the quick tremor of emotion. He banished from the field every competitor with God as source and author of these energies, compelled us to realise that even as we ourselves by the flash of will open the door which would rest listless on its hinge were it not for our effort, or raise the arm which but for our impulse would hang impassive at our side, so a Will that covers all the area of space imparts to all the worlds the myriad movements which throughout the æons never cease. He, by the rigid force of his reasoning, constrained us to believe that as we, each in his little range of empire, are conscious first causes of many a phenomenon, so of all the phenomena that sweep through the territories of creation a Living Will, akin to us, is the Great First Cause, which Will we can call by no other name than "God."

And his second great argument took a yet loftier range. It dealt with the facts of our moral nature. It sought to find the root and inward essence of that mysterious sense within our breasts that some sorts of conduct are worthier than others, that in every choice that is set before us it is base to choose the less worthy and reject the worthier, that we are under an unescapable obligation to prefer certain springs of action to others which compete with them; and he pressed on us the conviction that this sense of eternal contrast between the better and the worse is part of the universal order of the spiritual universe, that it is binding in all æons and in all worlds, and that that inherent obligation which we feel is an obligation immediate and direct to a living Lord of our wills, to whom we can give no other name than "God."

On the pillars of those two great arguments Martineau poised the splendid structure of his Theism. I for one believe that they are everlasting; and that while in the twentieth and later centuries temples ecclesiastic will show many a broken column and ruined arch, the philosophy thus welded will afford a refuge for the understanding through unnumbered years.

But while we must recognise first and foremost our master's achievements on the intellectual side of religion, we feel that this alone is far from constituting the total sum of his greatness. The philosopher deals first with the intellect and proceeds by methods of syllogism and dialectic, making his appeal to the pure reasoning faculty in man. But that philosopher is greatest who has yet another appeal to make to us—the appeal of the seer who by direct vision discerns the light of God and the glow on the countenance of the Eternal Love. Martineau was philosopher, but he was prophet too. Nay, his philosophy proceeds at its loftiest range by the very pathway of the prophet. He declares the facts of the moral and spiritual life, proclaims the direct experiences of conscience, the realities of the soul's communion with the Unseen God. And because these things in him are vital, vivid, of the inmost facts of life, his proclamation wakens response in brother souls. He is a Plato, it is true. But he is an Isaiah also; and ever and again the climbing feet of philosophy give place in him to the unfolded wings of inspiration. "Ye are the temple of the living God; the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are," is the inmost substance of his message. And after many a toilsome page in which with mallet and with saw he has been piecing together the cathedral of faith, he will suddenly bid us open our eyes and see, for the temple is complete already, and all the while the light of heaven has been streaming on us through its crimsoned windows and the music of its organ has been rolling through its aisles.

But with all the daring of his thought, with all the fearlessness of his criticism, master-mind and prophet-soul as he has been, James Martineau's attitude of spirit has ever been that of the disciple. He dealt with the Gospel records with a freedom and a trenchancy of criticism unsurpassed; yet to that young man of Nazareth, from whom he stripped the garb of miracle and even the very claim to be Messiah, he with his ninety years of cumulative wisdom bent the head with an awe, a love, a fervency of allegiance surpassed by no saint of the Christian calendar. It would be hard to imagine anything more beautiful or touching than this simple discipleship of the veteran heresiarch, who saw in Jesus simply a Galilean peasant unendowed with any gift of miracle or supernatural office. He owned him Master simply because he felt the divine beauty of his life and the divine truth of the principles which he proclaimed. And he followed him with an unswerving loyalty which none who call Jesus Lord and God surpass, and only the rarest souls are pure and true enough to equal.

And now he has passed on. I think of Watts's portrait of him—not as happy a presentation as that of Emslie with which most of us are more familiar, but having a rare nobility and beauty of its own. For on that dark canvas the venerable figure stands forth erect and slim, with face raised and wistful look upon the brow, so that it has always seemed to me as though some new and wondrous vision broke at that moment upon the seer. There is a strange surprise and yet a recognition of that which he has known for long in the lineaments of the countenance depicted. And it is so that I always think of this, my teacher and the master of my thinking, entering heaven; and now that he is gone I revert again and again to that image of him, and believe that he is called to take up a work and a range of influence compared to which what he has done amongst us here is but the exercise of ardent youth preparing for the superber tasks of his manhood's true maturity.

DR. MARTINEAU.

SIR,—May one who is not a member of the Unitarian body, but of the Society of Friends, be permitted to express, in your columns, the interest with which he has read, both in your ordinary and special issues, the testimonies borne by admiring disciples to the eminent worth of the late Dr. Martineau, and to add a few words on a reason why that great theologian is also held in high honour by many of us who are outside his own religious denomination.

It is partly because he so clearly perceived and so beautifully expressed, a truth which not merely Calvinism, but even Unitarianism also, appears to have largely ignored—namely, that the chief grandeur of God does not consist in physical power and immeasurable vastness, but rather in the spiritual majesty of an infinite pity, and of a both paternal and maternal condescension to the needs of minute mortals, by means of the sublime descent of self-sacrifice in the Incarnation, and even unto death.

In his "Endeavours after the Christian Life," in particular, Dr. Martineau plainly enunciated this view. Thus, at page 261, of the fourth edition, he styles the incarnate Christ—"The highest image of the Invisible God, the complete and finished representative of His moral prefections."

And the last passage in the same work is the memorable one: "The mind of Jesus of Nazareth reveals the perfect thought and inmost love of the All-ruling God—being the very Logos, the apprehensible nature of God, which, long unuttered to the world and abiding in the beginning with Him, has now come forth and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth."

How can any of us more reverently, or more truly, describe the absolute unity of the Supreme Father with His only-begotten Son, our Saviour? For God is indeed one and undivided, though (as many of us hold) self-manifested to humanity under Three "Personas" or aspects.

WILLIAM TALLACK.

Clapton Common, N.E.

[In this connection Dr. Martineau's two sermons on "Christ the Divine Word," in the second volume of Hours of Thought, should be carefully studied, where the thought is more fully worked out that God, "whose intellect overarches us in the vault of stars, whose beauty rests on the surface of the earth and sea, embodied His affections and His will in the person of the Son of Man." That it was God Himself who performed an act of condescension in "The sublime descent of self-sacrifice in the Incarnation, and even unto death," Dr. Martineau certainly did not hold.—ED. INQ.]

MARTINEAU MEMORIAL SERVICES.—In addition to the services noted last week, we have heard of the following; but it may doubtless be taken that a complete list would include the whole body of our churches:—

Bridport (Rev. H. S. Solly).
Clifton (Rev. J. Warschauer).
Deal (Rev. T. Shakespeare).
Dublin (Rev. G. Hamilton Vance).
Eastbourne (Rev. G. St. Clair).
Glasgow: St. Vincent-street (Rev. W. Binns).
London: Stamford-st. (Rev. F. Allen).
Manchester: Cross-street (Rev. E. P. Barrow).
Manchester: Platt (Rev. C. T. Poynting).
Merthyr Tydfil (Rev. D. J. Williams).
Newbury (Rev. E. Turland).
Shepton Mallett (Rev. L. T. Badcock).
Stockport (Rev. B. C. Constable).
Trowbridge (Rev. J. Wain).

We have received also a number of reports of Ruskin Memorial services.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL.

SINCE I last noted the Unitarian, &c., health of this district, steady progressive movement has been the rule, with little or no discount.

The great leap of the historic Renshaw-street congregation from a decadent city street to a fashionable residential suburb, and from an old-fashioned square chapel to a beautiful church, has been a great success. The surpliced choir of boys and men so entirely harmonises with its setting that qualms over the innovation have been lost in a new sense of the beauty of worship. I have, unhappily, only once been able to partake of that privilege, but have retained ever since the glow of the new warmth and colouring, so entirely in keeping with our cheery outlook and inlook.

Work has been commenced on the church hall and school buildings, which will also comprise a cloister for the cherishing of the monuments now in the old chapel. Speculation is very rife as to the fate of the old building when denuded of these hallowed memorials. Some of us harbour a hope that it may yet become a central institute and common gathering-place. Little alteration would be requisite to make it a commodious home for Unitarian Institute, week-night lectures, Tract Depôt, and headquarters of the Liverpool District Missionary Association—Nous verrons!

Finally, of Ullet-road Church it might be said "One thing lackest thou,"—namely, an offertory! A wealthy church, offering free hospitality to all-comers, increases the ranks of the well-to-do paupers who don't like paying pew-rents and subscriptions, aad whose idea of a Free Church is a church where they pay nothing and never have that objectionable bag or bowl presented to them. This makes it hard for the churches which depend on the cultivation of a pecuniary conscience in its adherents. Cheap religion is a snare!

Hope-street claims notice next. We all regret the continued delicacy of its honoured minister, Mr. Armstrong, but rejoice that after various enforced absences he is now at the helm again. He is well supplemented in his weakness by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, whose youthful vitality brings up the average.

The lovely little Church Hall recently opened is a valuable addition to the resources of the church. A new departure was inaugurated this month, by an invitation to the evening worshippers to adjourn after service to the Hall for music and social intercourse. It seems, where possible, an ideal consummation of common worship, in social communion. Many young people "living in" at houses of business, have no pleasant place in which to spend the last hour of their Sunday, and a warm, pleasant Church Hall is the very thing, if they have the good sense to use it. I have heard that on this occasion most of the congregation adjourned to the Hall, which was very full, and seemed to heartily enjoy the sacred songs and the friendly chat. The recent bazaar, whatever its financial results may have been, is everywhere spoken of as a real success and blessing for the church. It brought new life, energy, enthusiasm and fraternity into the somewhat depressed membership so long overshadowed by their minister's grave illness. It was a new birth, and has put a new song upon their lips.

The actual three days' sale was only the culmination of this swelling tide of health, and one felt the atmosphere charged with buoyancy and ozone.

The little Antient Chapel of Toxteth is also radiating new warmth. Minister and people are in close touch; progress is visible religiously, socially, and financially; and all that is now needed to clinch the nail, is the erection of a meeting-room for Sunday-school and congregational work. A site for it already exists, and we all hope that the near future may see it utilised. Mr. Jupp has endeared himself to all who know him, and his influence spreads beyond the primitive chapel whose spiritual traditions he so worthily sustains.

Birkenhead is not Liverpool, but is in our circle of close sympathies, so we rejoice that there too a new departure is being made. The present chapel stands in an unsuitable neighbourhood owing to change of population. It has been sold favourably, and a new site purchased in a residential district whence many of the congregation are drawn. A new school or church hall was recently opened, with a bright and successful meeting, and the building of a new chapel will follow as soon as may be.

Gateacre has the modesty of the violet, but its sweetness too. We hear little of its doings, but we know the spirit of its minister, and are assured that all is well with it.

Coming now to the children of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, Liscard claims the first word, not as the senior, but as the most brilliant. The completion and occupation of the Memorial Church and Hall, built and presented by Mrs. Elam in memory of her deeply respected husband, have inaugurated a new era for the church. In its chrysalis form in what was irreverently termed its "tin tabernacle," or galvanised iron structure, it had so much against it that the faithful labours of its earlier ministers got no fair chance. All the more credit to them for the solid foundations of religious life and social brotherhood which they laid. But with new and handsome buildings, and a young, energetic, and highly cultured minister fresh from Manchester College, all things seem possible. Large and, I believe, overflowing congregations have been gathered; the membership grows, the wave of enthusiasm gathers, and the future seems assured.

Crewe, for reasons well known, is a hard nut to crack; the forlorn hope of our district; and that Mr. Redfern has been able to show some progress is much to his credit. If anyone needs and deserves brotherly sympathy and cheer, the minister of an outlying chapel, fighting the good fight amidst an unfriendly population, and with the covert opposition of the great employers of labour to be overcome, is the one. It takes real grit and heroism to hold the fort under such conditions.

I dare not say much about Bootle, as my long period of partial invalidism has checked progress, and we only mark time. I hope this time next year to note growth. Meanwhile we have much to be thankful for, and all the material for a strong church if only the strong organising head and hand were at work. Time will show.

Under the auspices of the Association a modest but healthy start was made some months ago at Garston, a few miles out of Liverpool. Lectures were given in a public hall and a nucleus was formed, which, with efficient help and fostering care from the ministers of Gateacre and the Ancient Chapels, aided by some earnest and zealous lay preachers, has grown into a real, living little church. There is a Sunday-school with an average of twenty, and an average evening attendance at worship of thirty. A room has been rented for a year and local expenses are locally met.

The Association is seriously considering a forward movement in the way of finding and appointing a district missionary, who shall aid and superintend the work already in hand, organise lay preaching, break new ground where thought advisable, and generally be the leader of our religious enterprises. I sincerely trust the right man for this valuable work may be speedily forthcoming.

Our Domestic Missions must not be overlooked, as they represent our churches at work on the great social problems of our age.

Mill-street Mission throbs with life, and is the centre of many activities. In addition to its own work I see the Corporation are about to use its large hall for free lectures. The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones has been elected to the Board of Guardians, where his intimate knowledge of the population is of great service. Some of those who voted for him are offended because he will not be their "most obedient servant," but acts as his conscience dictates; but what he loses there he will gain elsewhere. The Hamilton-road Mission, under Mr. Haigh's benign rule, also pulsates with new blood. The Sunday-school overflows; a troop of energetic young men and women are at his beck for any good work; and although it is a Domestic Mission, they voluntarily contribute to offertories in chapel and school so heartily that a large part of the working expenses, heating, gas, cleaning, &c.. is defrayed by their collections.

At Bond-street a changing population, becoming more largely Irish Catholic every year and other circumstances, render the missionary work very difficult, and it seems probable that before very long some reconstruction of the work on smaller lines will be inevitable.

Space forbids detailed mention of smaller and yet helpful local efforts. Taken all in all, if Liverpool stands not where it did, it is because it has gone forward. H. W. HAWKES.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birmingham: Small Heath.—On Saturday, Jan. 27, the elder girls of the Waverley-road Sunday-school, under the direction of their teacher, Miss Matthews, entertained 103 poor children to tea. It was the second annual treat provided by the first class girls. The tea was followed by an entertainment, the chief item of which was an amusing children's drama, entitled Annie's Holidays. The evening was a very enjoyable one.

Blackpool (Appointment and Stone-laying).—The Rev. David Davis, formerly of Southampton, and recently of Fairfield High School, Liverpool, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the Bank-street pulpit, in succession to the Rev. W. Binns, and enters at once upon his duties. The Bank-street congregation are building a new schoolroom at a cost of about £400, and on Wednesday week the ceremony of laying the corner-stones took place. A short organ recital was first given in the church, and after prayer by the Rev. W. Binns, the company proceeded to the site, where stones were duly laid by Mrs. David Ainsworth, Mrs. H. Enfield Dowson, Mrs. Healey, ex-Mayoress of Heywood, and Mr. T. Holt, J.P., of Bury. Subsequently a vote of thanks to those who had taken part in the ceremony was moved in the church by Mr. T. Underwood, superintendent of the school. The speakers dwelt upon the great value of Sunday-school work, and warm testimony was borne to the services rendered by Mrs. Binns, as formerly superintendent of the school. In the evening a public meeting was held in the church, at which Mr. J. Lancaster, chairman of the Church Committee, presided, and was supported by the Mayor (Mr. Councillor Kingsbury), the Revs. W. Binns, H. E. Dowson, D. Davis, and H. B. Smith; Messrs. David Ainsworth, W. Healey, C. C. Grundy and others. The Rev. W. Binns spoke of the great advantage the congregation would derive from the new school-room, and made friendly reference to the congregation at the Masonic Hall, South Shore. With the enormous stretch of its promenade, Blackpool should be large enough for two places of worship in connection with the Unitarian body. The Rev. H. E. Dowson spoke of his long friendship with Mr. Binns, and paid a tribute to his brilliant gifts. He wished the congregation "God-speed" in entering on their new schools. Mr. Ainsworth and Mr. Healey also made encouraging speeches; and the Mayor added his tribute to the public services of several members of the congregation, and to the great benefit the community of Blackpool had derived from the presence of Mr. Binns, through the broadening and liberalising influence of his teaching and his example in the furtherance of all good causes. Speeches by Mr. T. Holt, the Revs. H. B. Smith and D. Davis, and Mr. C. C. Grundy followed, and the meeting concluded with cordial votes of thanks. At the recent annual meeting of the congregation, Mrs. Binns moved a resolution in memory of Dr. Martineau, and as one of the few remaining members of his Paradise-street congregation, spoke with much feeling of what she and others had owed to his teaching. The resolution was seconded by Mr. T. Underwood.

Bradford.—The work of renovating the Chapel-lane Chapel has been in progress since Christmas, and the Sunday services are now being held in the Channing Hall, which is well adapted for the purpose. On the chapel being examined, it has been discovered that eight of the arches over the aisles will have to be taken down and replaced owing to the foundation having given way. As this will be a costly undertaking, in addition to the £2,050 already raised for the new schools, &c., a very substantial amount will be required. In order not to burden the congregation with a debt, it is intended to hold another bazaar some time towards the end of the present year. On Sunday morning the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., preached his second sermon in memory of Dr. Martineau, and in the evening, devoting his services to the memory of John Ruskin, gave a résumé of the great thinker's life, work, and teaching. Appropriate music was rendered, including the solo, "It is Enough" (Mendelssohn), and the chorus, "He Giveth his Beloved Sleep" (Bridge), the latter of which was sung at the memorial service in Westminster Abbey. The new schools are giving great satisfaction. At the close of last year there were 287 scholars on the books, of whom 165 were over sixteen years of age.

Bootle.—The Sunday-school tea-party was held on 30th, with a good attendance of scholars. After tea games were carried on until eight, when parents and friends arrived. A very laughable sketch was given by three elder scholars, after which the superintendent, Mr. W. J. Pidgeon, gave a short address, and the prizes were given to their winners by the minister. The whole evening was much enjoyed.

Ciliau.—The Unitarian Chapel, says a writer in the Cambrian News, as it approaches completion, will become a subject for comment. The Unitarians used to vie with the other Nonconformists in a rigid adherence to plain and ugly conventicles. Ciliau Chapel outside presents the appearance of a "chapel of ease." It has a chancel, and on the pine end of the chapel and of the chancel there is a cross erected. The style and treatment of the design and arrangement of the whole fabric is emphatically ecclesiastical, and is quite a departure from the severity of the old style of dissenting chapels. It will be a stimulus to a love for the æsthetic in private and home life in a district where even the Church of England is more like a barn than a place of worship. The population will owe a debt of gratitude to their benefactor, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, who has been the chief organiser and director in obtaining funds and in insisting upon an ornate plan. The memorial stones bear the names of Mrs. and Miss Jenkins, Trecefel; Mrs. Evans, Tynant; Mr. T. Jonathan, Captain W. Davies, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., and the Rev. L. Williams, pastor. The chapel is dedicated to the memory of the Rev. D. Davis, Castell Howell, whose beneficent life and influence is still potent in the land.

Congleton.—A lecture on "Habit" was given in the Cross-street school on Tuesday, Jan. 30, by the Rev. E. R. Hayton, B.A. (Congregational minister). The Mayor of Congleton (Alderman Wm. Worrall) occupied the chair. A vote of thanks, moved by Mr. J. Dumville and seconded by the Rev. G. H. Smith, was given to the lecturer and to those who provided the musical part of the programme. Thanks to the Mayor for presiding brought the proceedings to a close.

Cullompton.—The children's winter treat, on Jan. 23, was held in the schoolroom. After tea and a programme of music, recitations, &c., book prizes were distributed. There was a large audience.

Deal (Appointment).—The Rev. T. Shakespeare, having completed a six months' engagement, has accepted, with unanimous invitation of trustees and congregation, the charge of the church. The meeting of the reading circle and Guild of Good Fellowship on Tuesday evenings are regularly continued, and some interesting lectures have been given.

Dean-row and Styal (Appointment).—The Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., of Scarborough, has accepted an invitation to become the minister of the united congregations of Styal and Dean-row.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—The Free Christian Church, late of Wellington-street, Leicester, have just erected a new Sunday-school on the Narborough-road, a rapidly growing suburb of the town, where they also hope shortly to erect a new church. The new school consists of a room about 60 ft. long, one end capable of being partitioned off to form a church parlour or special classroom. At the other end of the room are a kitchen and ladies' work parlour. Ornamental timber beams carry the roof, which has clerestory lights on each side. The various rooms are supplied with fresh warm air from ventilating radiators heated by low pressure steam apparatus. The rooms are supplied with electric light and also gas. The front elevation comprises a curved bay window of nine lights with a gable end, pleasingly carried out in local red brick and Burmantoft's terra-cotta, the apex containing the date A.D. 1900. Mr. Charles Kempson, A.R.I.B.A., has designed and superintended the carrying out of the work, and also prepared plans and estimates for the new church, acting as honorary architect. The opening ceremony took place on Jan. 25. The proceedings commenced with tea, when a large number of friends assembled; this was followed by a public meeting, when Mr. E. Clephan, J.P., formally declared the building opened. Much disappointment was felt at the enforced absence of the Revs. C. Hargrove, M.A., H. Gow, B.A., and Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee. During the evening interesting addresses were delivered by Mr. C. H. Roberts (President of the Church Committee), Mr. E. Clephan, Rev. W. G. Price (Hinckley), Mr. W. Simpson, Alderman Mott and the Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A. The meeting concluded with votes of thanks to the architect and the opener of the building. Much admiration was expressed at the skilful and artistic arrangement of the building. The schoolroom will be used for services and all other purposes until the church is erected. The sum of £1,000 is still needed to complete the scheme.

Leicester: Great Meeting.—The annual meeting was held at the schools on Wednesday evening, Jan. 24. Mr. Clephan, Chairman of the Vestry, presided, and there were about 200 present. Before any business was done the following resolution was moved by Mr. Clephan, seconded by Mr. Gow, and carried in silence, all standing:—"That the Great Meeting congregation at their annual meeting desire to express their sorrow for the death of Dr. Martineau, and to record their deep reverence for his character and their profound sense of obligation for the religious influence which he has exerted upon the life and thought of his times. They thank God for the great work which he has been enabled to do, and for the long, beautiful life which he has lived, and they desire to express their heartfelt sympathy with his family in their loss. May it be some consolation for them to know the deep reverence and gratitude in which his memory is held in the hearts of thousands to whom he has been a Prophet, a Teacher, and a Friend." The reports of the various institutions connected with the chapel were then read and confirmed, and nearly all appear to be in a flourishing condition, the Boys' Sunday-school especially so. The congregational report mentioned the loss of some old and valued members of the church, amongst others being Mrs. Gimson and Mr. and Mrs. W. Whetstone. Mr. Alfred Else also, although he had left the town, was still felt to be a friend and fellow-worshipper. Mr. Gow, in his speech, spoke of the added responsibilities which the loss of such members laid on those who were left. The Great Meeting had for generations held a high position in the town, and had been recognised as a power for good. It must be the heartfelt desire of all that its influence should not grow less, and that its membership should increase with the increasing size of the town. He also expressed his satisfaction that the Free Christian Church had been enabled to remove into a more promising situation and his conviction that under their present minister they would soon build up a vigorous and self-supporting congregation. The meeting terminated with a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Clephan.

London: Essex Church.—On Tuesday evening a very interesting lantern lecture on "Dr. Martineau's Life and Teaching" was given in the schoolroom by the Rev. F. K. Freeston. In the absence of Mr. Richard Worsley, the chair was taken by Mr Rupert Potter, a former lay-student of Manchester College, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Freeston for his lecture.

London: Kentish Town.—The annual general meeting of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, was held in the schoolroom last Monday evening, presided over by the minister, the Rev. Alexander Farquharson. Very satisfactory reports were presented by the hon. secretary, Mr. Arthur Savage Cooper, and by the hon. treasurer, Mr. J. F. Forbes, showing that during the year the membership, the pew rents, the subscriptions and the offertories had each substantially increased. Hearty congratulations were offered to the minister and to all concerned on the continued growth and prosperity of the Church, and a most pleasant evening concluded with hymn and benediction.

London: Stratford.—On Monday, Jan. 22, in connection with the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope, a lecture was given by Miss Marian Pritchard, on "Joan of Arc." The lecture was illustrated by lime-light views. Music was given by Miss Effie Turner and Miss Beatrice Pritchard. About eighty were present. On Wednesday, Jan. 24, the superintendent and teachers of the Sunday-school entertained some of the parents of the scholars at a tea and social meeting. Addresses were given by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Mr. Tavener, and Mr. Waddington, and songs and recitations by the teachers; about fifty were present.

London: Wood Green.—The tenth annual report of the Wood Green Unitarian Society has been issued, together with reports of the Sunday-school, and the Band of Hope and Mercy, and statements of account. The report speaks in grateful terms of Dr. Mummery's ministry, and records an increase of subscribing members of the Society from 82 at the close of 1898 to 100 at the close of last year. The finances are also in a satisfactory condition, with a small balance in hand. The congregation has undertaken, in conjunction with Highgate, to provide a stall at the London bazaar in May.

Reading.—On Wednesday week the annual New Year's party took place in the Victoria Hall. There was a large gathering of adults as well as children, for whom tea was provided. In the course of the evening a series of tableaux, by children, were arranged by the Misses Skinner, which, with other entertainments, made the evening pass very pleasantly. During the proceedings a collection was made on behalf of Winifred House, and realised £1 10s., which sum was duly forwarded a a contribution to the home.

Rotherham.—The first lecture of the second series was delivered before the Literary and Social Union of the Church of Our Father, on Tuesday, Jan. 23, by Mr. J. Leadbeater, on "Röntgen Rays and Colour Photography."

Sale.—At a recent meeting of the Social Guild a lecture was given by the Rev. C. Peach, of Manchester, on "Character as Fate in Shakespeare's Plays."

Scarborough (Resignation).—The Committee of Westborough Church has received, with great regret, the resignation of the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., which, under the circumstances, they have no alternative but to accept. It is gratifying to find that the sense of loss sustained by the church is shared in a marked degree by the townsfolk generally. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas will be missed in many good works, and by all who have known them.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meeting of this Society was held at the Old Town-hall, Pontypridd, on Thursday, Jan. 25. The President, Mr. J. Moy Evans, of Swansea, in the chair. The following delegates were present:—Aberdare, the Rev. E. Robinson Hughes and Mr. F. W. Hall; Cardiff, the Rev. J. Tyssul Davies, B.A., and Mr. W. A. Moore; Merthyr Tydvil, Messrs. Gomer Ll. Thomas and Robert Lloyd; Nottage, the Rev. W. J. Phillips; Pontypridd, the Rev. Dr. Griffiths and Mr. G. F. Hackar; Swansea, the Rev. W. T. Jones; Pentre, the Rev. David Rees and Miss Thomas; Wick, the Rev. David Evans; Mr. Lewis N. Williams (Treasurer), Mr. G. Carslake Thompson (Cardiff), Mr. John Lewis and the Rev. D. Williams (Hon. Secs.). The following resolution in reference to the late Dr. Martineau was passed, the delegates standing in reverent silence:—"The members of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society meeting at Pontypridd, on Jan. 25, desire to express their gratitude for the life and labours of the late Dr. James Martineau, and their sense of the loss sustained by the Unitarian body and the religious world generally by his death. They also desire to convey their most heartfelt sympathy to the members of his family in their bereavement." The usual business of the Society was done, and many matters of importance to the churches were discussed. In the evening a public meeting was held. The Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., took the chair at seven o'clock. After a vigorous address by the chairman on "The Unitarian Position," addresses of fifteen minutes' each were delivered on "The Unitarian Ideals," by the following ministers:—The Rev. W. T. Jones on "An Open Bible," the Rev. J. Phillips on "An Open Pulpit," and the Rev. J. T. Davies on "An Open Church." There was a good attendance, and the addresses, which were interesting and to the point, were listened to attentively throughout. Earlier in the afternoon a meeting of the Ministers' Union was held, when the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., read a carefully-prepared paper on "Ritualism." An interesting discussion followed.

Stockport.—On Thursday, Jan. 25, the annual parents' party and prize distribution was held in the schoolroom, presided over by the Rev. B. C. Constable. After tea ten of the school girls, dressed in Japanese costume, very prettily sang and acted The Song of the Merry Little Japs. The dresses, fans, &c., were kindly lent by the Sunday-school friends at Buxton. The children next performed the well-known operetta, Cinderella, very effectively. The minister then presented fifty-four prizes obtained by the scholars during the past year for regular attendance, all the books having been selected from the list published by our own London Sunday-school Association. Three scholars had not missed once during the year, and two had obtained prizes every year for the last eight years. The number of prizes was the largest for the last thirteen years. An enjoyable evening was brought to a conclusion by the performance of the farce Alive and Merry, by the dramatic class. On Sunday last the minister preached both morning and evening on the late John Ruskin. On Tuesday last the Rev. B. C. Constable gave a "Talk on Dwellers in our Gardens," based on Mrs. Wood's little book, and illustrated by about sixty lantern slides, to the members of the Band of Hope and their friends.

Urmston.—The Queen's-road Church was opened on Saturday, Jan. 27, the service being conducted by the Rev. Priestley Prime, the minister in charge, and the sermon, in the absence of the Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., being preached by the Rev. Dendy Agate from the words, "Ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual house." The musical part of the service was carried out by an efficient choir under the able conductorship of Mr. John Jackson, Dr. Boyse's anthem, "I have built thee an house," being sung. After service tea was served in the schoolroom to visitors, and a public meeting was subsequently held in the church, the chair being taken by the Rev. Priestley Prime. Letters of apology were read from the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, W. H. Burgess, B.A., Charles Roper, B.A., G. A. Payne, Dr. Christien, George Knight, Messrs. Charles W. Jones, James R. Beard, George W. Rayner Wood, and from ministers of the various congregations in the neighbourhood. Congratulatory speeches were made by the chairman, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Principal Gordon, Rev. W. H. Drummond, Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., Mr. Alfred Davison, Mr. G. W. Henshall (chairman of committee), and Mr. Canning, the architect. The speeches were interspersed with vocal and instrumental music, and the gatherings were most encouraging. The church seats nearly 200, and there were present at the service 180; at the meeting 140.

Whitchurch.—On Wednesday, Jan. 24, a sale of work was held in the schoolroom of the Church of the Saviour, followed by tea, after which a lecture on "Robert Browning" was given by Mr. Richard Robinson, of Birkenhead, which was much appreciated. The proceeds of sale and lecture were very satisfactory.

London Permanent Chapel Building Fund

An Appeal to Unitarians to assist in raising at least £12,000 for the support and spread of Liberal Christianity in the Metropolitan Area.

Treasurers—FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD, Esq., and FRANK PRESTON, Esq.

(1.) A portion of the Fund, not exceeding one-third of the net amount raised, shall be devoted to paying off debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of, some of our chapels and halls in or near London. The particular congregations to receive this assistance, and the amount of the assistance to be given to each such congregation, shall be settled by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, regard being had to the efforts made by each congregation to help itself.

(2.) The remainder of the Fund, not less than two-thirds of the whole, will be formed into a Permanent Chapel Building Fund for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with OPEN TRUSTS. This Fund shall be vested in a body of twelve Trustees, who shall be nominated in the first instance by the Council of Ministers and Delegates and the Subscribers to the Special Fund. The Trustees shall have a voice in the selection of the site, and shall themselves decide what amount they will advance towards the cost of its purchase and of the erection of the building.

(3.) The sum so advanced shall be a charge on the land and building, and shall be repaid in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Trustees shall in each case deem proper. The Trustees in their discretion may remit payment of interest. The income of such portion of the Fund as is not out on loan, and the interest on any loans, shall either be paid to the Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, or added to the capital of the Fund, as the Trustees may in each case determine.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE are now only a very few copies of the Martineau Memorial number of THE INQUIRER left. Of our regular subscribers, to whom we sent copies trusting that they would wish to have it, by far the greater number have forwarded the 5d. in payment. Others may have misunderstood our former note, but we shall be glad, as far as possible, to receive payment in all such cases.

WE have received a letter from the Aborigines Protection Society, signed by the President, Mr. Alfred E. Pease, and the Secretary, Mr. H. R. Fox Bourne, calling attention to the grievous sufferings of the South African natives consequent on the present war.

"This is especially the case with the people of Zululand and their kinsfolk in Natal, numbering about a million, whose country has thus far been the principal field of military operations, and among whom the desolation caused thereby is aggravated by the exclusion of many of their wage-earners from the Johannesburg, Kimberley, and other mining centres to which they hitherto resorted. Their misfortunes incident to the war follow, and are accompanied by, other disasters. As the sympathetic Secretary for Native Affairs wrote on Dec. 8, 'The earning power of thousands of natives is stopped, their herds were depleted by the rinderpest; the locusts have been, and still are, a scourge to their crops; and in consequence of the drought, there is every probability of the want of grain being greater next season than it is now.' The Natal authorities have done something in the way of immediate assistance; but it is officially stated that 'the Government will not be able to provide adequate or general relief, owing to the vastly increased expenditure occasioned by the war.'"

To meet the most pressing needs, for which it is estimated that at least £10,000 will be required, a Zulu Relief Fund has been started, for which contributions are now earnestly invited (cheques being crossed "Prescott, Dimsdale and Co."), to be sent to the Secretary at Broadway-Chambers, Westminster, S.W. All contributions will be promptly forwarded to Miss Colenso, at Bishopstowe, Pietermaritzburg, who will dispense the amount with the co-operation of the Secretary for Native Affairs and the Government officials in Natal.

HOMES of Rest and Recreation for Soldiers and Sailors in London, who have neither family nor friends with whom they can spend their leisure time, or to whom they can go when on leave or furlough, are greatly needed. The only institutions of the kind at present established are more or less denominational in character, and some degree of missionary effort is introduced into all of them. There is an eager demand among the men for a Home which shall be a home indeed and neither a public house nor a mission-hall. Such a Home, which, while encouraging an honourable and manly tone, shall be conducted on entirely NON-SECTARIAN lines, is being founded at 26, Morton-street, Belgravia (with the active support of the soldiers now in London) by Miss Lloyd, who has had fifteen years' experience at the Guards' Depôt at Caterham and elsewhere, and to whom Lord Roberts has written expressing his entire approval of the scheme. She proposes to have Club, Reading and Entertainment Room, a Refreshment Room (where, at moderate prices, everything but intoxicants will be supplied for the men or their relatives), besides bedrooms. It is believed that, in time, the Home will become self-supporting, but £600 will be required to furnish the building and meet the first year's expenses. Part of this money is already in hand, and further donations may be sent, after Feb. 8, to Miss Lloyd, at the Home.

AT Bedford College, three open "Occasional Lectures" will be given at five on Wednesday afternoons during the present term. The subject of the first, to be delivered on Feb. 14., by Mr. Milner Barry, will be "Nuremberg, the City of Albert Dürer and Hans Sachs," and this charming subject will be illustrated by lantern slides. Monsieur Victor Oger will give the second lecture on Feb. 21, taking for his subject "La Poesie Française au XIX. Siècle," and on March 7 Mrs. H. J. Tennant (Miss May Abraham) will describe the conditions of "Industrial Life and Law." Admission is by invitation tickets, which may be had on application to the Secretary, Bedford College, York-place, Baker-street, W.

THE closing year of a century naturally attracts to itself an unusual measure of interested attention, and from our habits in measuring time will acquire a special historical significance. Such a record, therefore, as that contained in the volume of "Who's Who" for 1900 is worth preserving, even apart from its immediate practical usefulness, which is great. "Who's Who" has an established reputation as an "annual biographical dictionary," and this fifty-second issue should have a very wide circulation. (Messrs. A. and C. Black. 3s. 6d. net.) It opens with a number of useful tables, such as are found also in "Whitaker," as to Parliament and Government officials, the Church, the Law, Army and Navy, Universities and Public Schools, learned and other societies, and there is an interesting list of the pseudonyms and pen-names of authors; but the bulk of the volume (nearly a thousand pages) is filled with short biographies of all the people living in this country at the time of publication judged to be of sufficient prominence to merit inclusion, while of foreigners a few of the most noted are included, among them being Tolstoi, Kruger, Labori, Zola, Tiele, and Pfleiderer, the last of whom has just celebrated the completion of twenty-five years of service at the University of Berlin.

IN such a work as "Who's Who," in which changes occur every year, it is of course difficult to preserve a due proportion in the space allotted to different men. We note, for instance, that Pfleiderer is allowed only nine lines, while to Karl Budde two-thirds of a column are devoted (one of the longest biographies in the book), and to Major-General Alliston-Champion Toker, C.B., of the Indian Staff Corps, half a column; and every reader is sure to miss some names, which in his opinion ought to be included, and to wonder why others are included or take up so much space. This is inevitable, but "Who's Who" grows fuller and more exact every year, while to curtail or omit any notice once included must be an extremely delicate matter. We should be inclined to refuse admission into such a book to any man who would not tell his age. Is it an accident that the year of Mr. Stephen Phillips' birth is not given? One amusing feature in the book is the addition of people's recreations, but we are sorry to see that Dr. Blake Odgers has none! The Principal of Manchester College puts down as his recreations, "Carpentering, cycling (lately)," and Mr. Addis, "Walking, study of Gothic architecture." The Archbishop of Canterbury says, "Usual games in boyhood and youth; light literature in old age." The two greatest names appear for the last time in this year's volume.

AT a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Sunday Society on the Monday following the death of Dr. Martineau, a resolution of condolence was passed on the motion of Mr. Mark H. Judge, seconded by the treasurer, Mr. Frederick Long. Dr. Martineau was a Vice-President of the Society, and from the first one of its warmest friends. He was one of the last deputation that waited on the Government, urging the advisability of opening the national museums on Sundays. In 1895 the Society passed a resolution, conveying to Dr. Martineau the congratulation of the members on his ninetieth birthday, at the same time placing on record their high appreciation of the valuable services he had often rendered to the cause of Sunday reform. The following was Dr. Martineau's reply :—

35, Gordon-square, London, W.C.

Dear Mr. Judge,—I have in vain endeavoured to keep pace with the expressions of congratulation and goodwill, poured in upon me, on occasion of my recent birthday, by numerous societies and other public bodies with which a long life has placed me in relation, and I must rely upon your indulgence to pardon the delay of my response to the kind and friendly message with which through you I was honoured by the Sunday Society. Most heartily do I thank the members for their generous words of congratulation, and their cordial acceptance of my very sincere co-operation, feeble though it is. I have valued much and constantly distributed for appreciated use the Sunday admissions placed from time to time at my disposal, and old as I am, I hope yet to see better and wiser service rendered to our people by that seventh part of human life which is happily left free for a higher culture of mind and heart and life than the working days alone can supply.—I remain, always yours sincerely,

JAMES MARTINEAU.

WE quoted last week part of the striking tribute to Dr. Martineau, which appeared in the Methodist Times. This was followed by a further contribution by a Wesleyan minister, who attended the funeral, and in the course of his article, wrote as follows :—

Returning home, past the abbey where he ought to have been laid, I opened a little desk where lie the few sacred mementoes I possess—the faded violets from Kingsley's grave in little Eversley, the spray of dried yew from Wordsworth's grave in quiet Grasmere, and the rest. There I found a little bundle of now thrice-precious letters written in the characteristically neat hand of Dr. Martineau, and I read them again, though I know them—every courteous and kindly phrase, every carefully selected word—off by heart. In one he says, "The doctor has hidden my pen away from me, but I have stolen it for five minutes to write to you." In another, "An eighty-fifth birthday is such an unusual occurrence, that for a time I have been buried in flowers, and have difficulty in rescuing myself from their perfume and their pressure." While in another he says, with modest pride, "I think you will be glad to hear of the unwonted recognition that has come to me. My 'Types of Ethical Theory,' of which you wrote all too generously, has been adopted as a text-book in the University of Calcutta."

. . . .

A few weeks ago he said to a fellow-minister and disciple, "My life is completed," and surveying the long line of volumes which carry his name, and thinking of the vast influence those volumes have had on the development of religious thought in all Churches, both of England and America, the words may be accepted as a worthy verdict upon a magnificent achievement.

THE Christian Register of Jan. 18 prints the following letter from Dr. Martineau, dated April 30, 1895, in answer to the greetings of the American Unitarian Association on his ninetieth birthday :—

To the Directors of the American Unitarian Association :—

Dear Friends,—You will not wonder that your Birthday greeting comes to me with a special charm, when I recall the fact that, though your Association is my junior by twenty years, we both began to preach at the same date; since it broke out at once into ordered speech as soon as it was born, while I had to learn my alphabet and a good deal else, before I could be admitted, even as an apprentice, to missionary work. Well and gratefully do I remember the more striking of those first Boston productions, and the fresh glow which they kindled, like the dawn of a new gospel, upon my heart. Without yet quite knowing why (for I had been moulded upon the pattern of our native Unitarianism), your New England religious literature, opening a new vein of inner experience, gave me at once the need and the courage to rethink the great problems of the spiritual life.

If, therefore, in the last sixty or seventy years any teaching of mine has spoken your thought and met with your approval, I have but reflected back the blessing which I had received; and it will be a joy to me forever if this reciprocation has deepened our fellowship, and admitted me to a place—be it only as a guest—with the goodly brotherhood of the living and the dead who have both taught and lived the truth of God among you.

Accept my warmest thanks for your affectionate appreciation of such service as I have tried to render, and believe me, to the end, your loving brother, JAMES MARTINEAU.

THE February Bookman gives a reproduction of Emslie's portrait of Dr. Martineau, as a full-page supplement, and also contains a sympathetic article, "by one who knew him." From this the following sentences are quoted :—

In personal converse there was a gracious sweetness about his customary manner, and a lofty sincerity which entranced the listener; for the sweetness was not the sweetness of mere amiability, but the sweetness that arises from conscious strength and wide sympathies. Dr. Martineau's manner, indeed, reminded one of the old text, "Out of the strong came forth sweetness." And, whilst charmed by his gentleness and old-world courtesy, those who conversed with him felt the tonic of his fine sincerity. No man hated polite evasions and word juggling more than he did, and when he felt deeply on a subject he would speak out his mind with that uncompromising directness which one associates with John Knox.

THE February Seed Sower contains a number of interesting articles on Dr. Martineau. The Rev. E. I. Fripp writes a sketch of his life and teaching, the Rev. L. P. Jacks describes his religious philosophy, the Rev. H. Gow writes "an appreciation," and the Rev. F. K. Freeston contributes "Recollections and Impressions." Mr. Freeston writes as Dr. Martineau's last senior student, and quotes the following sentence from a letter in reply to the students' greetings to Dr. Martineau on his eightieth birthday :—

Of all the greetings and good wishes which I have received this day, none have more deeply touched me than yours; and to you first must I render thanks for your generous and affectionate words. For more years than I need count, my relation to you and your predecessors has been unspeakably close to my conscience and my heart; and to sustain it faithfully has been the chief desire and prayer of my life. . . . . I can honestly say that if I have loved my work much, I have loved my pupils more; and in retiring from the field, not without a touch of evening sadness, no such heartfelt consolation can be given me as the assurance that that love is reciprocated. I pray you to accept my affectionate thanks for giving me this consolation, and to believe me, to the last, your attached and faithful friend, JAMES MARTINEAU.

Mr. Freeston's article is illustrated by a reproduction of the well-known early portrait of Dr. Martineau, but it is wrongly dated. The portrait was painted in 1846, not 1837, and therefore represents the author of the second series of "Endeavours" rather than the younger writer of the "Rationale." In Mr. Fripp's article we also note one or two slips. It was in 1822, not 1823, that the young engineer turned to the ministry. On p. 184 the Monthly Repository becomes the "Depository." And we have a strong impression that it was for Mr. Thom in Renshaw-street that Theodore Parker preached in 1844, and not for Mr. Martineau in Paradise-street.

THE following resolution has been passed by the Committee of Hope-street Church, Liverpool :—

That the Committee of Hope-street Church, on behalf of the congregation, desire to record their profound sense of the value of the life and labours of the Rev. James Martineau, D.D., &c., and their deep sympathy with his relatives in their bereavement by his death. While the members of Hope-street Church share with all thoughtful and religious men their admiration for Dr. Martineau's incomparable service to philosophy and religion, they claim the privilege of special association with those who grieve that they shall see his face no more. The elder among them remember in him a preacher and pastor who has left an indelible impression upon their minds and hearts, while the younger cherish the great tradition of his ministry and reflect with pride and gratitude that his name and fame are for ever entwined with the history of Hope-street Church; and they all unite in the prayer that his spirit may long dwell in their midst, an inspiring and hallowing influence on their worship and their life.

THE New Kingdom of this month contains an illustrated account of the old Knutsford Chapel by the Rev. G. A. Payne, and the first instalment of some "Reminiscences of China and the Chinese" by Mrs. Wilfred Harris. We are promised for next month a special Martineau number.

MAN is glorious and happy not by what he has, but by what he is. He can receive nothing better or nobler than the unfolding of his own spiritual nature.—Channing.

LITERATURE.

ON A STUDY TABLE.*

THE Jowett Lectureship, founded by Mrs. Humphry Ward's energy, in connection with the Passmore Edwards settlement, has enabled Professor R. H. Charles to expound the results of more than ten years of study of the Jewish eschatological literature (1). These results are now embodied in a substantial volume of 428 pages. Oxford scholars certainly cannot be accused of idleness, if it is remembered that this book, the first volume of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," and the highly suggestive treatise entitled "Exploratio Evangelica," by Professor Percy Gardner, were all published in the same week.

Dr. Charles has already made all Biblical scholars his debtors by his important series of translations from Apocalyptic texts. The central part of his treatise is, of course, built up on these materials. They belong, for the most part, to the interval between the literature of the two Testaments, and their treatment fills about a third of the book. The rest is distributed between the Old Testament and the New, the first getting rather the larger share. A very careful index of subjects is added: it is to be hoped that in another edition this may be supplemented by an index of passages quoted, the entire series of prophecies concerning the ideal future coming successively under the author's view. May it also be suggested that the paragraphs should be pruned of the repeated expressions "We shall now deal," "We have now done," "We have just seen," &c. Such little bridges are useful to the hearer in oral delivery; but their frequency becomes irritating to the reader. The description of Ecclesiasticus as "uncompromisingly tory" (p. 162), or of the Sadducees as upholding "the orthodox and tory view" (p. 204), is matter of taste; but such a sentence as "How this misconception was removed later, in some degree through the revelation to Peter, but mainly through that to Paul, we have not here to deal" (p. 336), is positively bad grammar.

So much for the critic's fault-finding. The student will have nothing but gratitude to Dr. Charles for the skill with which he arrays his evidence and marshals his conclusions. He may not always share the confidence of the author's judgment. For instance, in support of the thesis that the original beliefs about the dead in Israel were connected with ancestor-worship, Dr. Charles refers to the ceremony of enslavement prescribed in Exodus xxi. 2-6, according to which the person to be enslaved was to be brought to "the god," the family-god or teraphim, interprets our author, who dwelt in the doorway. It may be "quite wrong to take this door to be that of the temple" (p. 22); but is that the only alternative? In the case of theft of property entrusted by A to B, when B is instructed to "come near unto the god," Exod. xxii. 7, is that also the ancestral spirit who presided at the entrance of the house?

The reader, again, must be prepared for trenchant criticism. Professor Charles never lacks the courage of his convictions. We do not think that he does justice to Ezekiel when he says that in him "monotheism is but a barren and lifeless dogma" (p. 107). Surely the great preacher of the regeneration of Israel, forerunner of the Pauline conception of the work of the Spirit in conversion, deserves a warmer word than this. From another point of view the following statement might be open to challenge:—"The doctrine of eternal damnation [in Christianity] is a Judaistic survival of a still more grossly immoral character" (p. 311). What of the doom upon the goats? Professor Charles himself says that "in conformity with Jewish tradition the punishment is generally conceived as everlasting in the Gospels" (p. 343). Do the Gospels in this matter represent the teaching of Jesus? And if so, is that to be described as a Judaistic survival of a grossly immoral character? The fervour of Professor Charles's language, the noble vehemence of his protest against the conception that this life ends the opportunities for the grace of God to win back the sinful soul (cf. a fine passage on the Johannine principles, p. 373), apparently lead to some awkward consequences. It is quite true that he candidly warns us that New Testament eschatology may present inconsistencies like those of early prophetic or intervening eschatological literature, and his chapters on the New Testament doctrines supply a triumphant justification of his declaration that he will deal honestly by them. His clearness of insight and his frankness of speech are worthy of the highest honour compared with the deliberate refusal of orthodox apologetics to recognise the plainest facts. He does not attempt to minimise the significance of the language ascribed to Jesus about the second coming. On general grounds he rejects a considerable portion of the discourse on the Mount of Olives, as given in Mark xiii. (as he also excises, with Wendt, John v. 28–29), but he says unhesitatingly "That Christ expected to return during the existing generation is proved beyond question by such statements as Mark ix. 1 (=Matt. xvi. 28= Luke ix. 27)"; and he adds, "We must, accordingly, admit that this expectation of Christ was falsified" (p. 330–1). With the Christological inferences which are to be drawn from this fact we have now no concern. But it is a great gain to the cause of historical science that a scholar and critic in the front rank of Anglican learning should thus fully recognise the meaning of Christ's words. The contrast between the attitude of Dr. Charles and that of his predecessor in this field, Dr. Salmond, must strike every reader.

Many technical points offer themselves for discussion, but they are hardly suitable to the pages of this journal. The attention of students should be directed to the valuable note on the term "Son of Man" in Enoch, p. 214. It is an excellent instance of that thoroughness of work and exactness of method which have been obviously maintained without slackening through all the long and laborious studies which lie behind this book.

The Wisdom-literature of Israel is now beginning to receive the attention which it deserves as an element in the national life, hitherto too little regarded. The volume on "Proverbs" in the "International Critical Commentary," (2) from the pen of Professor C. H. Toy, of Harvard University, is a valuable contribution to this end. Professor Toy's fine scholarship has ample room in the discussions concerning the text which are inevitable in a commentary on this book. But these are not thrust upon the English reader. By a judicious arrangement of types he is at once warned off technical detail which he does not need. He may, however, be interested in the evidence produced from the Alexandrian translation to show that there were many aphorisms in circulation which are not found in the Hebrew book, or he may quietly enjoy the curiosities of interpretation which are gathered from some of the other versions or the medieval commentators. All that the reader needs for the elucidation of the text is here. A fresh rendering of the couplets often brings out points that are obscured even in our Revised Version; though sometimes the diction seems too colloquial, as in v. 14 "I had well-nigh come to complete grief." The subjects are often described with great terseness—occasionally perhaps a little too smartly, as in "God's criticism of life," xv. 3. The rare touches of humour do not pass unnoticed. Correspondences in Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon (and even in the post-Christian Pirkê Aboth) are diligently cited; and our author has his eye on Ptah-hotep (cf. Renouf's "Hibbert Lectures"), Plato, or Menander; while there are occasional references to Malan's great collection of ancient oriental parallels. Some readers will wish that this part of the commentary could have been fuller, but the volume already exceeds 550 pages. In the large group of proverbs concerning "life" and "death" we might have desired a little more elastic or imaginative recognition of the possibility that there might be another plane of thought beside that of prolonged felicity or disastrous overthrow on earth, and independent of future duration. The amalgamation of the collections constituting our present book is set unhesitatingly in the Greek age, and this judgment is not likely, we think, to be reversed. But it does not seem probable that the kings of xvi. 10-15 were Maccabean princes. There are plenty of similar reflexions in Ben Siva, who belongs by common consent to the age which preceded the revival of the Jewish power. And the suggestions of allusion to Greek philosophical ideas or terms, e.g., in xv. 3 or xxiii. 8*b*, must be received with caution. They are, however, only offered as hints, and do not carry with them the full weight of Professor Toy's positive judgments. Readers of his previous books will look for fine ethical appreciations, and will not be disappointed.

Those who remember Mr. Thomas Tyler's version of "Ecclesiastes," first published a quarter of a century ago, may like to renew their acquaintance with it in a new edition (3), and younger students ought to give this revised work a hearty welcome. The Introduction has been considerably extended, and now occupies ninety-nine pages. Long ago Mr. Tyler convinced us of his main thesis—namely, that "Ecclesiastes" showed traces of acquaintance with Greek culture. When once this thesis is admitted, however, there is always a danger of over-doing the evidence. Thus the new section added to the Introduction in order to establish a connection between Eccles. ii. 3, and the doctrine of the supreme good for man in the Nicomachean Ethics i. 7, does not seem so conclusive to us as to Mr. Tyler. Much fresh illustration is also introduced in relation to Stoicism, and the reader receives the impression of a very careful and independent piece of work. Mr. Tyler still adheres to the view that Koheleth is older than Ecclesiasticus, and sees no reason to abandon his former date, about 200 B.C., in which two of the latest Continental critics, Siegfried and Wildeboer, agree with him. The commentary (apart from the excellent "exegetical analysis" pp. 100-132) is somewhat meagre, and seems to take too little account of textual difficulties (cf. however §19 in the new Introduction, which repeats almost verbatim §15 in the old). Mr. Tyler commands our respect; he has great patience over riddles; but in the treatment of the text he is decidedly conservative.

Dr. Smythe Palmer continues his "Studies on Biblical Subjects," and in his second issue deals with Jacob at Bethel (¹). The book is divided into three parts—the vision, the stone, and the anointing. An immense quantity of curious learning is brought together to illustrate the conceptions of the sanctuary, the mountain of the gods, &c., the worship of sacred stones, and the "evolution of unction." The student will be grateful to Dr. Smythe for his many valuable references, and the numerous glimpses which his pages afford into interesting byways of belief. The details are often full of suggestion, but the total impression is less satisfactory. Thus the use of the Pentateuchal narratives is wholly uncritical. Gen. xxviii. is cited as if it were all of one piece, and the name El Shaddai in the opening verses is dragged in to the explanation of the vision (p. 27). The highly artificial names in the census-lists of Numbers belonging to the latest stages of the Priestly Code are adduced as "evidence of the great antiquity of stone-cult" (p. 130), and the same document is cited to support the statement that "at the foundation of the Mosaic system" Moses was commanded to anoint the tabernacle and its furniture (p. 135).

Similarly the language of accommodation is stretched unduly when Old Testament practices are described as "God's ritual ordinances" (p. 144). From another point of view Dr. Palmer's treatment does not seem to justify itself. He contends that the "ladder" of the vision was in reality a Babylonian terraced temple, and this supplies the theme for the whole of the first essay. As the word does not occur again in the Old Testament, its meaning must be more or less conjectural. But Dr. Palmer's arguments are not conclusive. He asserts that Jacob could have known no other shape for a "house of God," because no other then existed. What do we know of the little sanctuaries of Canaan? Further, he says that the visible presentment of a ladder is too incongruous a conception to be readily accepted. But it was certainly accepted elsewhere. Dr. Palmer himself quotes the pyramid texts of Pepi I., in which the ladder by which the departed soul might climb to the sky is solemnly addressed. He says that the nature of it is unexplained (p. 36). But he does not mention that it was regarded as a real ladder, for down to the Greco-Roman times ladders were deposited in the tombs, and certain of the gods, Ra, Horus, &c., were supposed to hold out their hands from the sky to help the climbers. Dr. Palmer might further compare the legend of the three golden staircases by which Buddha, accompanied on either hand by the great Brahma and Indra, descended from preaching to the gods in the Tavatimsa heaven. When he reached the earth, says the Chinese pilgrim Fa Hian, the three flights sank into the ground, all except seven steps, which remained visible. King Asoka (about 250 B.C.) tried to dig to the bottom of them, but his men could not reach it. So he built a monastery on the spot, and erected a stone pillar, which Fa Hian described; and this pillar was found in situ by General Cunningham in 1862. Alas, the archæologists of the Palestine Exploration Fund have not been able to find Jacob's Bethel!

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

"SOCIAL ASPECTS OF THE QUAKER FAITH."*

MR. GRUBB has given us a fresh and vigorous utterance of the spirit of present-day Quakerism, but one need not be a Friend in order to read it with interest and sympathy as well as with profit. Indeed, with the exception of the first paper, "Christ's Ideal of a Church," which is a statement of the non-sacerdotal and non-sacramental position, the book appeals equally to readers of all denominations. It brings the "inner light" to the solution of outward problems; but the author knows well that that light is no substitute for knowledge of economic principle, and hence his discussions are well-reasoned and temperate, though suffused with deep moral feeling. He uses the language of persuasion understood of all men, and even the illustrations and allusions by which he reminds us of his denominational connection carry a universal lesson. Thus, chiding his own society, he says:—

"Even our yearly meeting epistles take far more pains to define the theological position of our body than to insist upon the need for practically loving our neighbour as ourselves" (p. 105).

There is a good deal of plain speech of this sort, which may be taken home by others than Friends. Here is another extract, which shows how much, in Mr. Grubb's opinion, it may mean to be a true friend, without spelling the word with a capital F.

"It is, in my experience, exceptional to find employers (and still more, may I venture to say, the wives of employers) who can easily and readily put themselves in the place of the workpeople. In nearly every case when I hear the common remark, 'If you were in business you would see things differently,' I feel inclined to answer, 'Yes, and if you habitually met your workpeople as a friend, you would speak very differently.' Without sympathy—that is, ability to see another point of view—without imagination, without 'fraternity,' we shall not see the truth" (p. 76).

The book abounds in touches of this kind insisting on the moral elements which must go to the solution of the difficulties of our industrial life. And it need not be supposed that strictly economic aspects receive less thorough treatment on that account—they are illuminated rather than obscured by ethical illustration.

The least satisfactory essay in the book is the last, a critique of Mr. Kidd's pretentious but stupendously fallacious "Social Evolution." There is a strange disproportion between Mr. Grubb's exposition and criticism of Mr. Kidd's argument. The exposition is too long and too complimentary, in view of the objections which come after. The result may be indicated by the fact that a confessedly "fundamental criticism" is stated in a single page, and is only stated, not applied. Mr. Grubb says:—

"I have a profound distrust of arguments which virtually use reason to destroy reason, and I cannot think any good will come to either reason or religion of setting them up as hopelessly and finally irreconcilable the one with the other" (p. 248).

Yes, indeed, Mr. Grubb is well justified in his distrust, and yet he makes no attempt to show its bearing upon his previous exposition of Mr. Kidd's argument, though the view so profoundly distrusted is of its essence. The flattering tone of the exposition suggests that the critic did not realise how deep his objection cuts. Mr. Grubb does not do himself justice in his tenth essay. His most characteristic thought and manner are displayed in Essays II. to IX.

H. RAWLINGS.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

OUR chief interest this month centres in the Contemporary Review, which contains two articles of "Recollections" and "Personal Impressions" of Dr. Martineau, by Miss Frances Power Cobbe and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed respectively. Miss Cobbe's "Recollections" go back to about 1844, when she first read the Rationale and the Endeavours, and they include a number of interesting stories and some very striking letters of Dr. Martineau's, from the chief of which we have quoted in another column. When Miss Cobbe first took up her anti-vivisection work, Dr. Martineau gave his warm adhesion to the cause, and wrote in January, 1875, in reference to the Memorial to the R.S.P.C.A., for which she was collecting signatures:—

I should have been very sorry not to join in the protest against this hideous offence. The simultaneous loss from the morals of our advanced scientific men of all reverent sentiment towards beings above them as towards beings below, is a curious and instructive phenomenon highly significant of the process which their natures are undergoing at both ends.

And at one of the annual meetings of the Victoria-street Society, held at Lord Shaftesbury's, Dr. Martineau spoke in support of Mr. Reid's Bill for Total Prohibition. Miss Cobbe also tells how, when Dr. Martineau was obliged in 1872 to give up his pulpit, and she had expressed to him her grief that she should no longer listen to his preaching, "his head drooped; and he replied with infinite sadness in a low voice: It has been my life."

Mr. Wicksteed writes as an old student of Dr. Martineau's and his successor at Little Portland-street, telling of his characteristics as a teacher and as a practical school manager, and adding some extremely interesting notes on his manner of writing. There is a delightful and unexpected story of his taking some children to the pantomime (his own first and last visit), and the article concludes:—

* By E. Grubb, M.A. (Headley Bros. 3s. 6d.)

Mr. Watts's well-known portrait, while it nobly interprets the habitual seriousness of his temperament, does not do justice to his keen sense of enjoyment, which manifested itself in many ways, and not least in the gleeful laughter which none who knew him will forget. Mr. Emslie's portrait, if in some respects less of an interpretation, is a far more complete, and therefore adequate, rendering of his features, with all their variety of moods and possibilities, and Mr. Hope Pinker's statue is a majestic representation of him as he appeared in the last years of his life.

The other article in this number to which we would call special attention is by the Hon. Auberon Herbert, on "The Tragedy of Errors," telling dispassionately the story of the Transvaal negotiations with their miserable and disastrous misunderstandings and mistakes on both sides, bearing testimony to the admirable services rendered by Mr. Greene, and regretting that his salutary personal influence was not allowed a larger scope. The character of the Boers and the Outlanders is vividly depicted, and what might have been contrasted with what is. Mr. Herbert calls for an armistice, and a return to the position of last August, with a confession of the mistakes that have been made.

For the wise all things are possible. With generosity, with forgiveness on both sides, with good temper as befits those who have striven honourably with each other, with a real respect and esteem replacing the old contempt, and with a new and enlarged experience as regards the madness of such a war between kindred races as that to which we have both been most rashly committed, it is still possible for us to make a new future and to place our South African empire on the foundations of peace and friendship instead of undying hatred and enforced subjection. Let us show ourselves equal to the great occasion that now calls on us; let us both show that we have something in us better than the nature of the wolf that dies biting and rending; let us leave the dead past to bury its dead, and prepare for a new and better future. So, and only so, will all the blood that has been shed not have flowed altogether in vain.

The Nineteenth Century opens with four military articles, and then comes the Rev. Father Clarke, S.J., who shows how a clever Jesuit can deal with Dr. Mivart, who is declared never to have been a real Catholic at all.

In the Fortnightly, Mr. W. H. Mallock writes on "The Logic of Undenominational Christianity," which refers to Professor Sabatier's recent article on Dogma, and twice speaks of him as "Adolphe Sabbatier," but is occupied chiefly with an examination of Mrs. Humphry Ward's statement of liberal Christian faith. Only Catholicism, Mr. Mallock argues, can logically survive the destructive work of modern criticism on the Bible, because the Church vouches for the Bible. But he does not explain what vouches for the Church. Undogmatic Christianity is declared not to be Christianity at all. The value of Mr. Mallock's criticism may be measured by his assertion that it is inconsistent for one who denies the doctrine of Three Persons in the Trinity to affirm that there is a constant spiritual presence in our life, as an inward enlightener and the source of a growing religious life. Non-miraculous Christianity, he says, can have no objective and universal authority, because one who asserts its claim to our allegiance is left to his own feelings alone. So our critic denies implicitly that God is present in our inward life, and that the judgments of reason and conscience have any divine significance.

THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS IN EAST BENGAL.

Unity and the Minister, of Calcutta, of Dec. 24, reports as follows:—"The Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, the representative in India of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has completed a month's tour in East Bengal, and has proceeded to Madras to fulfil engagements there and in other towns in the Southern Presidency. Arriving at Barisal on Nov. 15, he remained there a week. There were four lectures, theological and literary, one Sunday evening discourse and one conversational meeting on theological topics, all held in the Brahmo Samaj Hall, which was full on each occasion, and some of the meetings were crowded. The audiences were composed of the principal inhabitants of the town—members of the local bar, acting and retired Magistrates, Munsifs, &c., with students. At the lecture on 'Emerson' Mr. Petrie, the District Judge, presided. Every day during his stay Mr. Williams had the pleasure of meeting numbers of Barisal people who came to the Dâk Bungalow for conversation on religious questions and literary topics—Brahmos, orthodox Hindus, and Mahommedans, including a great number of students.

"Dacca was reached on Nov. 23. A fortnight was spent here. During that time there were six lectures, two Sunday evening discourses, a conversation meeting, and a week-evening service and sermon in the New Dispensation Church. The lecture on 'Tennyson' was given in Jiban Babu's Mandap, Dal Bazar, Babu Sasibhusan Datta, M.A., Professor in Dacca College, in the chair; the lecture on 'Carlyle' in the Northbrook Hall, Mr. Douglas, District Judge, presiding, when there was an attendance estimated at not less than 500, which included the élite of the town. At all the meetings the audiences were large, and representative of the cultivated classes. Mr. Williams visited the Dacca Rescue Home, the Government College, the Government High School, the Eden School for Girls. The Dacca Rescue Home is doing a noble work, both preventive and reformatory, and doing it in a quiet, unostentatious way. As at Barisal, great numbers of friends of all religious views had daily conversations on religious subjects and on Western literature, especially students, a class of which there are about six thousand in Dacca.

"From Dec. 8 to 15 Mr. Williams was at Mymensingh. There were meetings here every evening—four lectures in the Town Hall, one Sunday evening service in the Brahmo Samaj Hall, one week-evening service and sermon in the New Dispensation Church, and two conversational meetings at the residence of the District Judge, Mr. A. C. Sen, at which Sadharan and New Dispensation Brahmos were present. One afternoon a visit was paid to the branch school of the Calcutta City Collegiate School, and an address was given, the students, to the number of 480, being assembled in the large hall. The congregation at the Sunday evening service filled the Brahmo Samaj Hall, and included a good number of the educated classes of all types of religion. The lectures at the Town Hall attracted satisfactory though not crowded audiences."

Our Calcutta contemporary concludes its report as follows:—"It is gratifying to us to know that this tour has been so successful, and that Mr. S. Fletcher Williams' lectures and sermons have been highly appreciated by the cultured community in Barisal, Dacca, and Mymensingh."

Referring to this tour and to Mr. Williams' work in Calcutta, the Bengal correspondent of the Madras Hindu writes in the issue of that paper for Dec. 28:—

"Mr. Williams is a Unitarian Christian, but his numerous lectures both in and about the Metropolis and in the Mofussil towns are largely attended by educated Indians, and they have hitherto elicited nothing but appreciation and praise. Unitarian Christianity such as is upheld by Mr. Williams is to all intents and purposes Universal Theism, or the Indian form of it which passes under the name of Brahmoism. But Mr. Williams' audiences do not consist of only Brahmos, but educated Hindus, and even the latter, not to say of the former, think themselves profited by his religious, ethical or theological discourses. The secret of it all seems to be the absence of dogmatism in the reverend gentleman's utterances. In short, Mr. Williams has been eloquently preaching Essential Religion and Essential Ethics, which the follower of every religion and creed will find little to take exception to. Thus Mr. Williams, though a Christian preacher, has been doing a good deal to advance the religious thought and raise the moral life of Hindus and Brahmos. It is altogether a phenomenon which is full of lessons to the ordinary Trinitarian Christian Missionary in India, who is proverbially full of dogma and denunciation, of bigotry and vituperation. The Rev. Mr. Williams has now been more than a year in India, and all those liberal-minded men who delight in the preaching of the spiritual life and moral culture, devoid of sectarianism, will admit that his mission has been a singular success."

Go on with your daily tasks, doing the best you can in your circumstances, and wait for God's time. It takes months for the apple to grow mellow and sweet on the tree. You will not always be struggling with faults, fainting under infirmities, bowing beneath burdens, striving in vain against difficulties. It doth not yet appear what you will be, but there is glory in reserve for you if you are only faithful.—J. R. Miller.

"BACK TO JESUS."

SIR,—I have no wish to add to the general discussion on this topic, but simply to thank Mr. Bennett and Mr. Drummond for their able contributions, and to express my opinion that the fire of their opponents has been too scattered and ineffectual to disturb their positions.

But I cannot refrain, in the absence of an abler pen, from demurring to Mr. Hargrove's contention that there can be nothing new in religion, and that the most enlightened Christian can get no nearer to God than did the Israelite who wrote, "As the hart pants after the water brooks, so pants my soul for Thee."

Then, if I understand Mr. Hargrove aright there can be no fresh revelation, no new birth. True, as he says, "Religion, the relation of the human soul to God, is an abiding fact"—but, he adds, "it does not admit of the new." Yet I venture to say our knowledge of that relation, if it grows—and there is no life without growth—must bring us to positions where all things become new to us. I should have thought that had been Mr. Hargrove's experience when he turned from Roman Catholicism to Unitarianism, as it was mine when I, about the same time, forsook Calvinism. To suggest, as it seems to me he does, that the advent of Christianity did not add anything new to the contents of religion, is, I think, an untenable position to take up.

And this leads me to his opinion that the expression of the Psalmist represents the high-water mark of human religious experience. Surely the voice of aspiration is not on the same level as the witness of realisation. Whatever may be the historical value of the Fourth Gospel, it is, at any rate, a part of the spiritual heritage of mankind. It embodies the religious experiences of one who has become the Christ of humanity. And he who said, "I and my Father are one;" "Father, I thank Thee that Thou hearest me, and I know that Thou always hearest me;" "Ye believe in God; believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so, I would have told you," had attained a height of spiritual knowledge that the Psalmist cannot touch

The Christian revelation constitutes a new starting-point for the race; it will be interpreted by every age according to the needs of the time, but it will answer to all. "God and the soul" seems to be the standpoint of Unitarianism. God and humanity is the Christian ideal as interpreted by the age; God realising himself in and through humanity, they all becoming one in Him that His kingdom may come on earth.

Like armies converging on one point, so the popular Churches, led by their best men, are becoming inspired with this thought.

If the Unitarian Churches are to become living institutions in the coming century, they, too, must share the ideal, or be cast like drift-wood useless on the melancholy shore, while the full stream of human endeavour rushes on to the realisation of its new-born hopes. E. CAPLETON.

SIR,—I have read with the greatest interest the important discussion which has been carried on of late under the above title in the columns of THE INQUIRER. Such discussions are very suggestive and helpful. In order that the present one may become still more so, might I ask the Rev. Ambrose Bennett if he would not kindly throw a little more light on the following points connected with the central tenet of his religious system—God's forgiveness of sins:—

1. How can the prime fact of religion concerning man be the fact of sin which is a disorder, and not purity, righteousness, love, which are moral order?

2. How can Mr. Bennett consider it impossible for the All-Holy to forgive his sin, and yet have the assurance that it is forgiven?

3. What does Mr. Bennett understand by the forgiveness of sins? If it be the removal of the guilt of sin, how can such a removal be affected by an act of God?

4. In what way is the assurance that sin is forgiven by God communicated to man? JAMES HOCART.

JOHN RUSKIN.

SIR,—Thinking that your readers might possibly like to see the accompanying addition to your "Memorabilia" of a great and good man, a judicious friend advises me to send you the following:—When the Rev. F. D. Maurice had established his Working Men's College, I heard that Mr. Ruskin had generously undertaken to teach a drawing-class thereat, and I went one Saturday evening to hear his closing address to the students.

Of course it contained many striking remarks, and among others this: "Now, remember, gentlemen, that I have not been trying to teach you to draw, only to see. Two men are walking through Clare Market, one of them comes out at the other end not a bit wiser than when he went in, the other notices a bit of parsley hanging over the edge of a butter-woman's basket and carries away with him images of beauty which in the course of his daily work he incorporates with it for many a day. I want you to see things like these."

At the close of the address a gentleman sitting next me went up with me to the platform to thank Mr. Ruskin not merely for that address but for the remarkable good he had been conferring year after year on the English-speaking race, and indeed on the whole world by the stimulus he had given to the true influence of Beauty, and the uplifting power of Art. I shall never forget the sad and wistful smile that came over his face as he turned a little away saying, "Oh, do you think so! it seems to me as if I looked back only on a misspent life and wasted opportunities." This is not the time and place perhaps to record the generous and unstinted support which he gave me some years later in my endeavours to establish a "Society for the Prevention of Pauperism and Crime," but I can never forget it.

THE POSTAL MISSION.

SIR,—Will you allow me a little space in THE INQUIRER to remind the friends and supporters of the Central Postal Mission that subscriptions are due in January, and should be sent direct to the hon. treas., Miss Ellen M. Lawrence, 26, Kensington Palace-gardens, W. May I also say that we are urgently needing new and increased subscriptions to carry on efficiently and to develope the Suffolk Village Mission which is prospering well. It is quite essential to get more help about the Sunday services to prevent our excellent minister, Mr. Amey, getting quite worn out. The two chapels of Bedfield and Framlingham are five miles apart, which makes the Sunday work all the more arduous. If liberal donations, or better still subscriptions, could be put into our treasurer's hands early in the year, it would enable our Committee to arrange the work so that Mr. Amey should have a good holiday which he much needs, and later on enable him to break fresh ground by holding week-evening services and carrying on missionary work in Bedfield and the neighbouring villages, which he has set his heart on doing.

An additional sum of £50 is needed.

"A DAY of Humiliation. Will it help us to Victory?" is the question which the Rev. Charles Hargrove asks and answers in his sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. In what light he regards the call to special intercession in the hour of defeat will be seen from the following passage:—

"To ask of God to make our generals cleverer than the Boer generals, to prevent their riflemen hitting the human mark, and to help ours to do it more effectually, to reveal to us the enemy's tactics and give us skill to outwit them—all this seems to me the very desecration of prayer, and almost like a return to heathen superstition. When I read in the letter of a Wesleyan chaplain the remonstrance against a cannonade on Sunday afternoon 'that this is surely not the way to propitiate the God of Battles'—or when, in another letter, deemed worthy of insertion in the best of religious papers, The Guardian, I find it suggested that a remedy for our present troubles will be found if we:—'Make the reading of the Bible (with explanation) compulsory in all State-aided schools; and at the next census make an acknowledgment to God by means of a capitation grant of one shilling for State almshouses'—and that then 'the affairs of the Empire will be in a better way to prosper'—I ask myself what manner of God is this who is supposed to interfere in favour of one side or other according as they propitiate Him with certain religious rights and offerings?"

The confession of our sins, and the renewed consecration of our lives to the service of God's Kingdom, must be effected in a very different spirit from this.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Fénelon's Letters to Men."

You ask to be taught how to pray, and how to seek union with God, so as to be sustained against life's temptations, and I am sure you greatly desire to find the help you need in this holy practice. I think you cannot treat God with too much confidence. Tell Him all that is in your heart, as one unloads one's heart to a dear friend of all that gives it pain or pleasure. Tell Him your troubles, that He may comfort you; tell Him your joys, that He may sober them; tell Him your longings, that He may purify them; tell Him your mislikings, that He may help you to conquer them; talk to Him of your temptations, that He may shield you from them; show Him all the wounds of your heart, that He may heal them. Lay bare to Him your indifference to good, your depraved taste for evil, your dissipation, your instability, your leanings to a corrupt world. Tell Him how self-love disposes you to be unjust to your neighbours, how vanity tempts you to be insincere, and to dazzle those with whom you are concerned; how your pride disguises you to yourself as well as to others. If you thus pour out to Him all your weakness, needs, and troubles, there will be no lack of what to say; you will never exhaust this subject, it is continually being renewed.

People who have no secrets from each other never want subjects of conversation; they do not premeditate or weigh their words, because there is nothing to be kept back. Neither do they seek for something to say; they talk together out of the abundance of their heart—without consideration, just what they think. The heart of each speaks to the other; they pour out, so to say, one into another. Blessed are they who attain to such familiar, unreserved intercourse with God!

In proportion as you talk to Him He will talk to you; and often you should be silent and let Him speak, so that you may listen in the stillness of your heart. Say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth"; and "I will hearken what the Lord will say concerning me." Add with a loving, dutiful mind, "Lord, think no scorn of me." The Spirit of Truth will teach you inwardly all that Jesus Christ teaches you outwardly in the Gospel. This is no extraordinary inspiration in which you need fear delusion; it will only inspire you with the virtues suited to your condition and the ways of dying to yourself that you may live to God. It is an inward voice, which teaches us we have need from time to time.

God is the True Friend who always gives us the counsel and comfort we need. Our danger lies in resisting Him; so it is essential that we get a habit of hearkening to His voice, of keeping silence within, and listening so as to lose nothing of what He says to us. We know well enough how to keep outward silence, and to hush our spoken words; but we know little of interior silence. It lies in hushing our idle, restless, wandering imagination, in quieting the promptings of our worldly minds, and in suppressing the crowd of unprofitable thoughts which excite and disturb the soul.

In prayer we should confine ourselves to simple affections and few points, on which it is better to dwell rather with love than argumentatively. Head-work tires, disgusts, exhausts us; but acquiescence of mind and union of the heart do not weary us in the same way. The spirit of faith and love never stanches so long as we do not forsake the Source.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Thy Will be Done.—II.

"Sometimes," I said last week, "this prayer has to be prayed with the trustful bearing of very sorrowful and dreadful things." Sometimes there is the eager pressing forward to do our part in what is right and good, the brave and patient holding to truth and honour at all costs, the steadfast effort to be faithful in our daily lives, all of which we know to be our Father's will; but there is also the bearing of things we cannot help, pain and sorrow and loss, the having to give up or do without things we long for very much, and through it all to be still patient and faithful, as those who know that they are children of the Father in heaven. We all of us have to learn to pray the prayer in that other way.

Jesus has not only given us the words of this prayer; his whole life tells us about it and makes its wonderful meaning more clear, both in the faithful doing and bearing of the Father's will. As a boy he had grown up obedient and helpful in his home at Nazareth, and learnt to understand more and more perfectly the goodness and the love of God, the heavenly Father. Then, when he became a teacher, he made men feel how beautiful it was to trust in that love, and how it was by the way of duty, holding to righteousness before all, that they could be worthy of it, and be indeed children of God. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father, who is in heaven." His message of the Father's love was full of gladness, but he had also a great tenderness for suffering and sorrow, and he himself was not without grievous trials. He was often lonely, and misunderstood, and though "the common people heard him gladly," he had enemies as well, and they at last found a way to have him put to death. But even when he saw what must come of it Jesus would not be turned aside from his fearless teaching of righteousness and the love of God. So he prayed with his whole heart, "Father, not my will, but thine, be done," and when we think of how he bore his cruel death on the cross, we feel that he had not prayed in vain, and there is in our hearts a great thankfulness to God, because stronger than all the agony and darkness of that hour is the great conviction that the faithful sufferer, faithful unto death, passes out of the shadows into the light and peace of heaven, and the love of God is yet over all.

So the Cross of Jesus is the great ensign of self-sacrifice, and it is a constant reminder to us all of the divine secret of unselfishness; for with Jesus the faithful death was simply the crown of faithful life, and as we glory in the death of noble martyrs we know that the same spirit ought to be in our daily lives.

Which do you think would be the hardest, in a time of glorious enthusiasm, to speak your word of truth, and to hold fast to what you know is just and right, in the face of an angry mob, to be stoned to death as Stephen was, or burnt alive, or torn to pieces by savage beasts, like many of the old martyrs, or through long years to bear the burden and the frequent weary pain of a crippled back, and to be patient and cheerful, to keep from growing selfish and bitter, so that people would love and honour you for your brave and noble spirit? Perhaps we cannot say which would be hardest, and we have not to choose for ourselves; but we know that in many humble ways people have to learn to bear hard things, and through that patient and cheerful bearing to be helpers and not hinderers in the world, and so learn truly to pray, "Thy will be done."

Do you remember how in Mrs. Ewing's "Story of a Short Life," Leonard learnt to be "a brave poor thing," and to be happy in his hard lot? Often the most unselfish people, of the sweetest disposition, are those who have some great privation to bear, whether from a crippled limb or some other cause, and have learnt to do without things that others enjoy so much, and bravely to bear a great deal of pain. They make us ashamed of our impatience and selfishness, and teach us the great lesson of our life.

If you are not so quick as some of your friends, and do not get on so well with lessons or in games, and do not get so much praise, that is no reason for being envious and disagreeable to them. Be unselfishly glad for them, and just do the best you can with your own gifts and powers, being patient and good tempered over your defects, and you will know that is the right way. And so it is when others have more beautiful homes and are richer in many ways. Envy is one of the ugliest things in the world and most contrary to our Father's will. We have to be rich in love, in good humour and cheerfulness and helpfulness, and always in truth and honour, which even the poorest can have; and the world will be as beautiful and full of joy to us as to anyone, because our Father's will is done.

One other thing I must say to you about this prayer. Some of you know what it is, when those who are very dear are taken away by death. Then indeed we must pray, "Thy will be done." For that teaches us that they are with our Father still, and His tender love and care are watching over them as over us. And we love them more than ever. We must try to live so as to be worthy of their love and it draws us always nearer to them, and nearer to our Father in heaven. So His will is done.

With reference to a note which recently appeared in these columns, in which a country minister asked whether any provision of hospitality was likely to be made for the wives of ministers invited to the National Conference at Leicester, it must be remembered that the necessary provision of hospitality at the Conference goes far beyond what can be met by ordinary private resources; but we know that our friends at Leicester are making their preparations with the most generous good-will, and that they will do all that lies in their power to meet the demands of the occasion.

The world manages to get on with a very few great men, but it could not get along at all without a great many good men.—Samuel M. Crothers.

SEER AND CONSOLER.

IT has been of the deepest interest to us during the past month to gather up the many worthy tributes to Dr. MARTINEAU which have appeared from representatives of the most various Christian communions, and to reproduce some of the most striking passages of these in our columns. We have been thankful to read many noble words of appreciation, reverence, and gratitude, honourable to the writers as they were significant of the transcendent influence of him to whom they referred. The measure of insight shown in such tributes has been naturally very various. The Weekly Register (a Catholic Review), for instance, in a generous and interesting notice, shows, perhaps, inevitable limitations of sympathy in the following as in other passages:—

To maintain the existence of God, the reality of a future life, and the supremacy of conscience, are in these days no small titles to respect. But when one has attributed this much to Dr. Martineau, it must be confessed one has done all.

The Church Times, on the other hand, wrote:—"By many a devout thinker in the Church of England some burning words of Dr. MARTINEAU are recollected as an incentive to deeper thought and more intense spirituality." The Spectator said of his sermons:—"Spirit speaks to spirit in these pages, which are worthy of the finest mysticism of the Catholic Church at her best, while at the same time manly, healthy, in harmony with human reason." A writer in the February Bookman says:—"A mystic—in the best sense of the word—with the spiritual fervour of a TAULER and the poetic sensibility of a COLERIDGE, it was the inner life, the life of devotion to a CHRIST-ideal, which consecrated his entire being." The Rev. PHILIP WICKSTEED, in an article in the current number of the Contemporary Review, says:—"At the sound of his voice slumbering souls were wakened. In contact with his thought spiritual and mental energies were roused; and this in a measure which places him in the front rank of the living and life-giving influences of our time."

Such words as these point, as it appears to us, to the supreme gift of our great teacher, which made him a Seer of the things of GOD; and it is not only in his sermons, but in many passages of his essays and his greater philosophical works that this direct spiritual insight is manifested, and this power of wakening the deeper life in others. And then we remember with a profound and expectant thankfulness, even as we look upon the wealth of his published works, that this is not yet all that we may hope to possess of his completed life. For, as it has been truly said, the Teacher was greater than his works, and as friend and pastor he gave himself, with unstinted sympathy, and in the most intimate converse, to those who needed his help.

He once, indeed, said that he had been beset all his life by an almost unconquerable shyness. This might seem amazing, yet it did sometimes set a seal upon his lips; in presence of a great sorrow, speech seemed like desecration. But in his letters this reserve was abandoned, and the richness of his sympathies had full play.

So we cherish the hope that we shall yet be brought closer to that great heart, and through the Life that must be written, with the help of the abundance of his intimate letters, enjoy the quickening and uplifting companionship of his noble and inspiring presence.

In this month's Contemporary we have already an earnest of what may yet be given us; for, in addition to Mr. WICKSTEED'S article, to which we have already referred, there is another by Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE, rich in personal recollections, and yet more deeply interesting for the letters included in it.

One letter in particular—"almost," as Miss COBBE says, "too sacred for publication"—we are yet very thankful to have, and from this we shall here reproduce some of the most helpful passages. It was written in 1868, to one who for years had been a prisoner through painful and disabling illness, one of whom Dr. MARTINEAU wrote after her death to one of her daughters:—"Your dear mother has for many years been one of the sanctities of life and thought to me. Whilst her outward lot half-tempted one to look on this scene of things as simply cruel, her inward spirit so transfigured it as to demonstrate it divine."

It is from the mutual conference of those who are withdrawn to suffer, and those who are left out to act, that the pure wisdom and complete interpretation of life must come. Even then, when you to whom the anguish falls, and we on whom it is reflected, have told and compared our best thoughts, it all resolves itself—does it not?—into simple trust and love: "Though He slay me, yet I will trust in Him." At least, when I ask myself, "Why this crushing inroad upon the sweetest, purest, most satisfying form of human life?" I am lost in the darkness, and dare not pretend to see my way. But the less I can reach the Divine point of view, the more quietly do I subside upon the human, and in spite of appearances or in impenetrable gloom, give my hand, like a child in the night, to be led by the All-seeing Father hither or thither as He will. This is not the blindness of mere unthinking faith; rather is it the large willingness to sink the personal point of vision—even at its fiercest intensity—in judging of the Infinite within whose compass I lie, and of whose goodness, not my privation, but the plenitude of the whole, is the true measure.

Alas! dear friend, that the lot of sacrifice should have fallen to you! But what should we be without the biographies of noble suffering? Is there anything so purifying in its search of us—that sinks the self so low and lifts the soul so high—as the sight of pain and grief divinely borne? I declare to you the instances I have seen or known of such lives, including yours, haunt me as a perpetual presence, and mingle tender and sacred undertones with the superficial voices of daily duty and of natural joy. That the chords which give forth such music for humanity should thrill with anguish in the striking is indeed a pathetic necessity; but the very pity of it, burning down into the heart of us, comes in contact with all the love and reverence we have, and kindles them into an enveloping passion.

Seven years, dear friend, if I mistake not, you have been laid low; and passing through what none can tell. Even to our outside reckoning it is a large segment from our little round of time; and from the interior, the hours of suffering seem endless, a weary and waste eternity. Well, the more they use up of this life, the more do they bespeak another, and by breaking off our purpose so near its beginning, reserve the more for its heavenly end. You know how little you have exhausted the capacities of your nature; at what a stage of growing thirst, in thought, affection, aspiration, you have been brought to pause; and how time alone and scope, perhaps denied you here, are needed to fulness of spiritual power and to the attainment of those supreme ends which would never be ideally given us except as incitements to their realisation. Rightly to appreciate the measure of our spiritual nature is to discern at once the prospective attitude of life, and see in it but the first act of a larger drama. What its ulterior scenes may have in store for us, it were presumptuous to surmise, beyond simply this: that the broken thread of our personal existence will be taken up, and the continuity of faculty and discipline resumed. Here we have been called, by secret insight and irrepressible aspiration, to resist external tyrannies, to work out our best thought, to make, in our small measure, a divine poem of our life. But ere we have gone far, with only a few stanzas which we meant to revise and sweeten, the moulding hand is struck down, and the fragment stops in the middle of a line. When we wake to it again with brighter thought, it must surely be to weave it on whence it was left off; to carry out its pervading idea with the same intellectual materials, and the same lights and shadows of love; and to give it movement amid the same personal relations which supply its action and make music of its rhythm here. In short, a soul that is the same must have a life that is the same, and over no thought that is true, no affection that is pure, no piety that is trustful, can Death have any power. Though we know no more, here let us rest.

THE IMPORTANCE OF PERSONALITY.

THERE is one statement in Mr. Armstrong's interesting Essay "Back to Jesus," which, though more than touched upon in the original review and in the subsequent correspondence, needs, I think, more adequate notice than it has yet received in your columns; and as the discussion seems at last to be veering round to this point, I ask your permission to single it out for special comment. The passage will be found in pp. 97-8 :—

Let me then say that, for my own part, I yield to none in love and reverence for that gracious Master, whose words touch me as no other words have ever touched me, and whose person seems to me the most lovable and reverend, the purest, the most beautiful, the holiest that has ever worn human flesh.

But there is a point where sentiment dips into sentimentality. That point seems to me to be reached by those who say, as I have heard it said, "It is not the teaching, but the person of Jesus which is primary to us." To approach one who threw the whole passion of his soul into the word he taught, who was so swayed by the desire to quicken in the souls of men a faith of incomparable loveliness and grandeur that he gave all his days, his life, himself, for that transcendant mission, and to say to him, "Lord, what thou sayest and wouldest teach is doubtless true and good; but it is not this truth with which thou art aflame, but thine own person that we would chiefly honour," would seem to me the very mockery of homage. How can any do honour to Jesus save by taking to heart the things he said, the supreme and all-glorious truths which he gave himself to establish in the world?

Mr. Armstrong has put the case with unnecessary rigour, and even with an innuendo that those who make the Person primary are likely to neglect or disparage his teaching. This, I hope and believe, was not intended as a deliberate insinuation, but rather as a signal-post of danger. As the concluding words of the passage would seem to suggest, the more power the Personality has over our hearts and minds, the greater heed we are likely as a general rule to give to the accredited teaching.

There are ample reasons why we should object to the sharp cleavage which the essayist makes between Person and teaching, but I waive the objection and take up the defence on his own terms. In doing so, however, I would guard myself against misunderstanding, and state at the outset that, like Mr. Gow, I, too, was inexpressibly shocked at the attack upon mysticism in Hermann's "Communion with God"; but that there is some slight justification for this hostile attitude no one has shown more clearly and cogently than Mr. Armstrong himself in his lucid little book, "God and the Soul." I would recognise with him a true and false mysticism; but apart from the religious consciousness of humanity in the past and in the present, I know no touchstone of sanity whereby I can distinguish the true from the false, the inspirations of genius from the fanaticisms of madness. So far, however, from believing that the Eternal Reality of religion depends upon Jesus or upon any written roll of a book, I am convinced that a human being, unlettered and untutored, deaf, dumb, and blind, bereft of physical sense, and cast upon a desert island, would still, however dimly, have within his spirit the felt presence of God. But religion in normal life, as THE INQUIRER aptly put it some time ago in its leader on the late F. W. Newman, is not made up of "an infinite series of communions of two." Human life is an organic whole, and the God-consciousness of any one of us, least of all of Jesus, is not a matter of indifference to all others. We are all individually parts of the quivering tissue of historic religious humanity. In the words of the great leader who has just left us, "I cannot rest contentedly on the past; I cannot take a step towards the future without its support." As an element in that past, as a governing factor in the development of the present, the total effect of the life of Jesus is—until, at least, a higher life, now inconceivable to me, appears—literally of supreme importance. And when we come to estimate that total effect, we must admit that its source is primarily in the personality, not in the teaching. It is an extravagant and almost reckless overstatement to say that we should apart from him be without God, but it seems to me that the word "God" has a deeper and more awful content when read in the light of historic Christianity. I would cling to Jesus, therefore, not merely with the weakness of my doubt, but with the full strength of my faith. And though I admire Mr. Armstrong's manly and timely appeal on behalf of the teaching of our Master, and so far go with him with an undivided heart, I cannot but think that he has slipped into a grave and serious misinterpretation of the facts of his own religious consciousness in the passage which I have quoted. For what is the argument, displayed in its nakedness, but this—that teaching is primary, and, therefore, of greater importance than the Personality of which it is but an incomplete expression: that truth of teaching should be chiefly honoured, therefore, honoured before the personal truth of life, without which it would have been sounding brass and a clanging cymbal? Given a true life, we may be sure that the teaching will be the beautiful efflorescence of that life; but we cannot invert this thought and say that a merely correct doctrine can confer any sincerity or beauty upon life. We can surely imagine the Great Assassin saying with cynical ease, "Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted," and a modern mammon worshipper taking up as its antiphonal response "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth"

The fact is assuredly that while a mathematical truth (e.g., 2 + 2 = 4) would remain just as forcible whether announced by a villain or a saint, a moral or spiritual truth, on the contrary, is comparatively impotent until it becomes a winged shaft shot from the centre of a Personal Power.

This has been repeatedly insisted upon by writers of our own household of faith, and I cannot bring it home more effectively and more modestly than by quoting from sources which I know Mr. Armstrong will respect.

Thus Dr. Drummond says in his Hibbert Lectures ("Via, Veritas, Vita," pp. 11-12) :—

It is clear that we cannot regard Christianity simply as a truth or a system of truths, which, as Theodore Parker said, would be just as true if Herod or Cataline had taught them, and which, like the truths of astronomy or biology, when once discovered become the property of the race, resting exclusively on their own evidence, and leaving to the discoverer, some religious Newton or Darwin, only an historical or antiquarian interest. He who discovers a truth of science hands it over as an impersonal gift to mankind, and the value of the truth has no connection with the life of him who first propounded it. He might sink into as complete oblivion as the great astronomers of Chaldea; but the science would remain with unimpaired vitality and value. But a special type of religious life cannot be so easily detached from him in whom it was first enshrined. It cannot be taught like a lesson in mathematics or chemistry, but must enter as a refining power into the mind, transmuting its dross into fine gold, and cleansing that inward eye by which spiritual truth is discerned. It spreads, not by the calculable process of the intellect, but, as it were, by a holy contagion of exalted feeling; and hence he who introduces it into the world becomes at once its inspirer and its norm, giving life through the communion of faith and love, and restoring that life to pristine purity when it has strayed into extravagance and error. If conscious sonship be the essence of Christianity, then he to whom that sonship was such an absorbing reality that he made it a reality to the world, must stand in an undying relation to that spiritual movement of which he is not only the ancient source, but is still the source in multitudes of hearts.

And again (p. 13) :—

Christianity as a living spirit in the world does not begin and end with the oral teaching of Jesus himself, but must include the total specific effect of his life and teaching upon the human soul.

Dr. Albert Réville (in his "History of the Dogma of the Deity of Christ," Eng. Trans., p. 4) writes :—

Much would still be wanting to explain the propagating power possessed by this new ideal, if we confined ourselves to pointing out its abstract truth and beauty. . . . In vain would Jesus have expounded his sublime views upon the true relationship of man and God, if his person had not been itself the incarnation of the ideal which his teaching revealed to thought. He was himself quite aware of this, and, while admitting very plainly the possibility of a real communion with God outside the circle of his own personal influence, he recognised the fact that only those who attached themselves personally to him became thoroughly impregnated with his spirit.

The position taken here is confirmed by the opinions of Dr. Adolf Harnack, who writes ("Christianity and History," p. 35, Eng. Trans.) :—

It was not what the person said that was new and strange. He came when the time was fulfilled, and spoke what the time required—but how he said it; how it became in him the strength and power of a new life; how he translated it to his disciples. That was his secret, and that was what was new in him.

These quotations I cannot but believe will prove a sufficient defence, or at least a sufficient indication of a line of defence, without any supporting argument. When that is needed it will be forthcoming, but I have little inclination at present to marshall its force because I find it difficult to believe that Mr. Armstrong will maintain his long silence and adhere to the strict meaning of his words.

For what are the far-off issues of his position? They will be seen in this further thought. If teaching is primary and Personality of little account, what have we to say in practical exposition of Theism? Are we not left dumb before the argument that an "Infinite Moral Ideal" or some other ideal substitute for God is quite adequate for practical religion, and that, therefore, we should throw in our lot with earnest agnostics, and keep our views on the Personality or supra-Personality of God in the background as mere distracting non-essentials of enlightened devotion? I can imagine an "Ethical Culturist" pouncing eagerly upon Mr. Armstrong's unguarded utterance, and saying: "Yes, you speak truly, there is a point where sentiment dips into sentimentality. That point seems to me to be reached by yourself and by those who say, as I have heard it said: 'It is not the inspiration or the notion of ethical obligation, but the Inspirer and the All-Righteous Law-giver that is primary to us.'" What has Mr. Armstrong to say to him? Will he reply simply and inconclusively that there can be no true parallel between the personality of a human teacher and the Personality of God? But, without entering into a philosophical debate on the possibility of crudely circumscribing and separating in a Deistic fashion the human personality from the Divine, I may point out that if "this truth with which thou art aflame" were an abstract truth having its first source in the mind of Jesus, then surely Jesus—the Person—is the originator of the truth, not the truth the originator of Jesus. If, on the other hand, this truth was the God-consciousness of Jesus, having its source in nothing lower than the Personality of God, then we do but admit that Christ is an incarnation of the Personal Deity. In other words, the "truth" is now an immanent Personal Truth—the Divine Originator of Christ sending him into the world as the Way, the Truth, the Life. In either case we have to accept Personality as primary—whether it be the harshly circumscribed Personality of Jesus or the Personality of God in Christ, or such a complete unity of both as Mr. Armstrong protests against in "God and the Soul."

The question raised by this Essay is, therefore, at once a deeper and more general one than that of the correct criticism of the historical records. What would be the interest of criticism for us unless it were a passion arising out of a profound appreciation of the importance of the Personality of whom the testimony bears witness?

ONLY the Golden Rule of Christ can bring the Golden Age for man.—Frances E. Willard.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD ON "THE NEW REFORMATION."

IN a letter which appeared in the Liverpool Daily Post of Jan. 30, Mrs. Humphry Ward once more makes her plea for the inclusion of liberal Christian thinkers in the communion of the Church of England, urging on the orthodox majority that the only terms should be those which Christ himself exacted—"If ye love me, keep the commandments. . . . This do, and ye shall live," asking for assent of the heart rather than agreement of the intellect.

The immediate aims of the liberalising movement Mrs. Ward states as follows:—

(1) To claim the right of admission to baptism, confirmation, and the Lord's Supper within the National Church for all believers in God who desire to accept Christ as their King and spiritual leader, to enter the society founded by his life and death, and to associate themselves with his conceptions of man's nature and of God.

(2) To obtain that the only condition of this admission should lie in the simple desire of the recipient to be counted among the Christian body (upholding of course the moral conditions of the present Communion Rubric), not in the acceptance of any symbols or articles drawn up by Christians of another age than ours, and under different intellectual conditions.

(3) To this end to obtain an alternative clause in the Confirmation Service, and the recognition of those claiming the use of it as full members of the Church.

Those pressing these claims are not to be understood as making thereby any attack whatever upon the faith of others. Nor do they for the present desire any change in the services and formularies of the Church, other than the personal and optional change which I have described.

As a first step, Mrs. Ward makes a suggestion, which will be of interest to many others besides those immediately concerned, and to this we will add the concluding passages of the letter:—

"How are these things to be gained? What if in each town the small and simple beginnings of a new Broad Church Union could be established? What if the foundations of a lay study of Christian dogma and Christian history, a veritable 'new learning,' fraught with no less momentous consequences for practical Christian life and organisation than the 'new learning' of Colet and Erasmus was for the life of the sixteenth century, could be slowly and steadily laid throughout the kingdom? Let a few people in each large town, in each congregation, try and establish such a union. Let them take a few well-known books — Harnack's 'History of Dogma,' Schürer's 'Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ,' Hausrath's 'New Testament Times' (all in English translations), Carpenter's 'First Three Gospels,' Professor Percy Gardner's admirable 'Exploratio Evangelica,' Martineau's 'Seat of Authority in Religion,' and Dr. Caird's 'Evolution of Religion'— and read them with their Bibles, discuss and digest them. The fascination of the study is what no one can realise till they have attempted it. The mass of English educated people are deplorably ignorant of its very rudiments. Yet it concerns the deepest depths of our national life."

"The Christian Church, whatever may have been its historical lapses, is not truly or ideally the possession of any party or opinion, as St. Paul told us long ago. It is the 'assembly of the faithful,' in joining which, now as always, the Christian is 'prepared to attach himself to Christ's person and to obey his commands.' The precise nature and meaning of this attachment and obedience is, or ought to be, for the man's own decision. So it was in the early days of the first Christian generation; so it is coming to be for us again, when, after the travail of nineteen centuries, the growth of that new instrument of human intelligence which we know as the modern study of history has brought us back nearer, perhaps, to the original fact than those between us and the Synoptists have ever been—just as our generation knows more of ancient Egypt than it was possible for Herodotus to know. And, indeed, may it not be asked, and without any breach of humility, whether in a strange, but true, sense we of to-day may not, if we will, discern that primitive fact more truly even than was possible for St. Paul, since the preconceptions which intervened between him and it are no longer ours, and we are, moreover, able to bring to its understanding both the witness and interpretation of the Christian consciousness as it has been rendered and observed through 1900 years, and the fruits of that long discipline of man's perceptive and critical powers which has filled the same period of history, and is no less God's will and God's work? The recovery of the primitive fact, plus the long witness and comment of history—the return from the external to the inward, from the letter to the spirit—the penetration beneath the successive statements of the intellect to the abiding and unchanging realities of conscience, love, and faith—the replacing of the argument from miracle, Scripture, and tradition, by the argument from moral and personal experience, from the actual effects of Christ's living and dying, re-enacted within our thought and life—this is what we mean—is it not?—by a 'new reformation'—this it is to which we look forward for the renewing and transformation of Christianity in the century that is now beginning.

"Meanwhile, small steps and much patience are before us. The formation of independent lay groups throughout the country for a new religious study—(Oxford is now probably able to provide teachers for such a movement)—the quiet accumulation of the names of clergy ready to help the advancing laity, and the wise planning of the best means by which candidates for confirmation may combine to press the acceptance of a new pledge upon their pastors and their bishop—these are some of the tasks that would lie, I venture to suggest, before a Broad Church Union. Such a movement would soon force upon the attention of the more ignorant or prejudiced clergy the existence of that new learning which has just produced among us the 'Encyclopædia Biblica,' and Professor Gardner's most significant book; and in the Roman communion has forced Dr. Mivart to resign his Catholic position; it would soon have its effect upon the teaching of the Anglican training colleges; and it might lead to very curious developments of the Protestant agitation. As the Church Times well sees, Dr. Mivart has not challenged Cardinal Vaughan and the Vatican upon any particularly Roman doctrine. His quarrel concerns us all—concerns 'that question which is at the root of the whole matter—namely, Scripture.' And upon the old lines Cardinal Vaughan's position—incredible defiance as it is to the educated mind of Europe—is the only consistent one. Either we depend upon the letter—in which case the miracle of the angel hailing Habbacuc through the air with his bowl of pottage is not a whit more difficult to believe, or substantially less well attested than the story of the Magi, or the miracle of the Gadarene swine; or we depend on the spirit, and the witness of God's Spirit with ours—in which case a whole new world of thought, faith, and organisation comes into view."

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

THE annual meeting of the College was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, Jan. 31, the President, Mr. FRANK TAYLOR, J.P., of Bolton, in the chair. The report of the Committee was read by the Rev. DENDY AGATE, one of the secretaries.

The Report, having acknowledged the continued faithful services of the Principal and Tutor, recorded that during the past session there had been three theological students and ten students at Owens College. Referring to the disappointing results of University examinations, the adoption of the following new by-laws was noted:—

2. Any student who has not passed the preliminary examination of his University before the beginning of his second year; and also the intermediate examination before the beginning of his third year, will not be allowed any extension of his two years' Arts curriculum.

3. It will be in the discretion of the Committee to grant to any student who has passed the intermediate examination of his University, a third year in Arts, with a view to graduation.

The Committee also strongly recommend to intending candidates that, if possible, they should pass the preliminary examination of the Victoria University before entering the College.

The present session opened with four theological students and ten students at Owens College. It was recorded with great satisfaction that Mr. H. J. Rossington, B.A., the senior student, had been appointed a Hibbert scholar for one year, dating from June next, the first appointment made by the trustees of a student direct from the College. Having recorded the loss by death of many valued friends of the College, and chief among them, Sir Henry Tate, the Report proceeded:—

"Your Committee feel that, apart from Dr. Martineau's universally-recognised claims to honour and affection, there are several reasons why this Report, presented so soon after his death, should also bear its tribute to him. The first two principals of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, Dr. Beard and Mr. Gaskell, were his fellow-students at York; their two successors, Mr. Odgers and Mr. Gordon, and nearly all others who have ever served the College as tutors, were his pupils; the long line of clerical secretaries stood in the same happy relation to him, as did many members of your successive Committees; the earliest Tate scholar, Mr. Tarrant; your senior visitor, Mr. Moore; and other students passed from these walls to enter his classes in Manchester New College, London; and it would be difficult to overrate the influence which he has exerted on the teaching and the spirit of this place of training for ministers of Christ's Gospel. Such breadth and spirituality, such devotion to high thought and earnest living as may mark the men whom we send out, are due largely to him, for he taught the teachers. On one of his rare recent visits to Manchester, and during the principalship of the Rev. J. E. Odgers, Dr. Martineau came into the class-room, at Mr. Odgers's request, and addressed some most kindly and inspiring words to the students. It is fitting on every ground that we should testify, however imperfectly, our admiration for him and the loving honour in which we hold his memory."

While the Committee had been deprived during the year of the services of their treasurer (Mr. James R. Beard) they rejoiced that his restoration to health had made steady progress, and that while he retained his old office he felt able to accept nomination as president of the College. In the meantime the Committee renewed their thanks to Mr. George Hadfield for so efficiently acting as deputy treasurer.

The long and faithful services of Mr. E. C. Harding as a former treasurer and a member of the Committee, from which he had felt obliged to withdraw, were cordially acknowledged. The treasurer's statement showed an income of £1,314 19s., a decrease of £70 5s. 10d. on the previous year, while the expenditure had been £1,345 4s. 8d., a decrease of only £45 14s. 11d. During the year there had been a loss of subscriptions amounting to £48 7s., and a gain only of £18 19s. 6d. Donations, including £100 from Mr. H. W. Gair, of Liverpool, amounted to £114 4s.

Mr. GEORGE HADFIELD, in explaining the accounts, announced a donation of £50 from Sir J. T. Brunner, and £2 from a Shrewsbury fund, which wiped out the adverse balance.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, and in doing so said he thought the alterations which had been made in the by-laws were justified. He mentioned that since the report was printed another loss had been sustained in the death of an old student of the College, the Rev. David Thompson, of Dromore. He noted as a gratifying feature of the report that, out of 100 former students of the College now engaged in the practical work of the ministry, seventy-five were subscribers to the College. He noticed, however, many churches where, apart from the minister, no subscription was given to the College, though former students ministered there. In concluding, the Chairman said he believed there was more need than ever of an increase of preaching power amongst their ministers, who would, he was afraid, compare unfavourably with orthodox preachers.

The Rev. A. W. Fox seconded the motion and said he thought the report gave them good ground for hope in the future.

The CHAIRMAN moved the following resolution:—

That the annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College desires to record its deep sense of the loss occasioned by the death of Sir Henry Tate, Bart., during the past year, as well to the community at large as to this institution, which, in addition to other benefactions, owes to him the foundation of the Tate Scholarship in the year 1878, and the munificent donation of the Henry Tate Endowment Fund of £5,000 in the year 1895 to encourage the cultivation of preaching power and pastoral ability. That this meeting expresses its high regard for the late Sir Henry Tate's eminent character, and respectfully offers this tribute to his memory.

Colonel PILCHER, in seconding the resolution, said they had all a sense of how much was owing to the late Sir Henry Tate for his generous and wise gifts, and he trusted that the example he had set would be followed by others.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. G. H. LEIGH, a vote of thanks was passed to the examiners and to Dr. Buckley and Dr. Emrys Jones for honorary services.

The officers for next year were then elected, on the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by the Rev. J. M. BASS. It was pointed out by the Chairman that in electing as their new president Mr. James R. Beard they were doing honour to one who had done service in connection with their Church and institutions for many years past. They also owed a debt of gratitude, he said, to Mr. Agate and Mr. E. Talbot, their secretaries.

The meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the president, moved by Colonel PILCHER, and seconded by Mr. J. H. BROOKS.

EVENING MEETING.

In the evening the annual soirée and public meeting were held, Mr. FRANK TAYLOR again occupying the chair. The proceedings were full of interest, though the attendance was much smaller than in most recent years. This was to be attributed partly no doubt to the prevalence of sickness; partly also, perhaps, to the fact that a great soirée in connection with the Manchester stall at the forthcoming London Bazaar had been arranged for the following Monday. After the hymn, "Lord, while for all mankind we pray," had been sung, Mr. TAYLOR delivered his address.

He reminded his hearers of the honoured names associated with that College—Beard, Gaskell, Brooke Herford, Wright, Poynting, Odgers among its teachers; Ivie Mackie, C. S. Grundy, Sharpe, Shipman, Rawson among the laymen, who had given loyal support, men whose memory should inspire them to continued and faithful service in the future. They had that afternoon held their forty-fifth annual business meeting, and the report, on which he commented in detail, showed much ground for satisfaction. He noted with special pleasure how a goodly number of their students had proceeded to Manchester College in London, and now at Oxford for further studies, among whom had been Bowie, Tarrant, Philemon Moore, Richard Moore, Weatherall, and Emanuel Thomas, which was proof sufficient of the wisdom of the course. The appointment of Mr. Rossington as a Hibbert scholar was matter for sincere congratulation.

Having paid an earnest tribute to the supporters of the college removed by death, Mr. TAYLOR proceeded to speak of the purpose of such an institution as theirs, to train men who should bear witness to the perennial need of religion, and make clearer the divine guidance in the world, and lead men nearer to the Infinite. Jesus Christ had done more than any other to reveal and deepen that God-consciousness, and in his spirit their work must be done, battling against sin, temptation and ignorance, lifting mankind to a diviner life, to a clearer conception of duty and vision of God.

"But this College," he added, "has a distinctive name—that of Unitarian. A name of which some of us are proud, because of the memories of the saintly men and women who have borne faithful witness to it in the past, yet a name which we interpret in no narrow and exclusive spirit, because we believe it to be as broad as Christianity itself. But it is not my wish to-night to unfurl and wave the banner of a dogmatic and aggressive Unitarianism, needful as that may be sometimes, for I cannot forget the happy metaphor of dear Dr. Brooke Herford, for whom the word proseltyism has no terrors, but who said, 'it is sometimes a useful and healthy thing to give the apple tree a good shake.' I have little faith in an 'invertebrate religion,' and cordially echo the words of Dr. Stopford Brooke when he says, 'Whatever you profess, cling to with all your soul.'

"By whatever name the group of churches with which we profess to be connected is known, whether it be that of Unitarian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, or Non-subscribing, some of us believe that these churches have done good work in the past, and have still a gospel to preach, a still more glorious work to do in the future if only we be faithful to the principles for which they stand. To help and teach in the doing of this great and noble work, this College was founded for the training of a succession of ministers who should devote their lives to it."

Speaking further of the need of special training for ministers, and of the difficulties and glory of their work, Mr. TAYLOR said:—

"That great Teacher, Philosopher, and Saint, who has so recently passed away from us amid our universal reverence and love, speaking of the twofold aspect of a minister's work, says: 'We, too, like Christ, must traverse the desert and meet the fiends of temptation. We have the path of self-denial to tread, and the midnight watch to meet, and the heavy cross to bear upon the dolorous way; only never alone, for the Father is with us, and passing freely into His hand to seek our own will no more, we shall not be without our moments of transfiguration and saintly communion, or the angel of peace that strengthens for the last sacrifice. Remembering that self-seeking is human, self-forgetfulness divine, we know at once where the strength and the victory lie.' And I think there is a special fitness in quoting these words to-night, for they are taken from the charge addressed by the revered Dr. Martineau to the Rev. A. Gordon on his settlement as minister of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, in 1863. In that charge Dr. Martineau speaks of our friend as a Timothy, whose own inheritance and 'faith unfeigned' has been improved by faithful culture, and he urges not even the most sagacious and strong to 'despise his youth.' And this Timothy of 1863 has now become the learned Principal of this College, of whom we are all so justly proud; so rich in varied experience, in spiritual culture, in historical, ecclesiastical, theological, and antiquarian lore."

There were many others, both the conspicuous and the humblest workers, of whom little was heard, who yet bore witness to the brighter side of a minister's life. The work was difficult and trying, but it had the highest privileges; and he made this final appeal:—"Oh, my friends in the ministry of our churches, you who are in the thick of life's battle, as well as you who are about to put on your armour, recognise the greatness and sacredness of your life calling. Do not belittle it, but idealise it and strive to realise your ideal. See to it that your heart is touched by the Spirit of God and filled with the Spirit of Jesus Christ. On your onward journey put your hands in the hands of Jesus, so that as he leads you through this wondrous life other men may look and see you walking with him and learn to love him through your love, and be drawn nearer to the Great Father. Feel with the valiant Paul of old you are ambassadors for Christ to inspire and lead men and women to a diviner life, and so hasten on the coming of the Kingdom of God upon earth."

The REV. THOMAS LEYLAND, as an old student, gave an account of his early days, and his work in the College, and bore his testimony to the good men by whom he had been taught. The Principal, the Rev. ALEX. GORDON, spoke chiefly of Sir Henry Tate, of whom he gave interesting personal reminiscences, and of Dr. Martineau, to whom he paid a most eloquent and touching tribute.

During the evening some excellent music was furnished by a quartet party from Hale and Bowden, under the direction of Mr. R. Harrop Wolff. The services of these friends, as of the Chairman, were recognised in a cordial vote of thanks.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

THE seventeenth annual general meeting of contributors to the Sustentation Fund was held on Wednesday, Feb. 7, at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square, the President, Mr. WILLIAM LONG, in the chair. There were also present the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, and F. K. Freeston, Dr. Haward, Messrs. David Martineau, Philip J. Worsley, Charles Haring, J. Cogan Conway, Frank Preston, E. Chatfeild Clark (treasurer), and A. W. Worthington (secretary).

Apologies for absence had been received from Mr. Harry Rawson, Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter and others.

The minutes of the last meeting having been read and confirmed, Mr. Worthington read the Managers' Report.

THE REPORT.

The gradually lengthening experience of your Board of Managers maintains and increases their sense of the value of this Fund. Many congregations, especially in country towns, find it difficult, if not impossible, unless they have a considerable local endowment, to provide the stipend needful to secure a "faithful and efficient minister." The grants made by your Board, though frequently insufficient to raise the stipends to a satisfactory amount, help to secure the maintenance of regular ministers in cases where otherwise the chapel doors might have to be occasionally, or even constantly, closed. The aid thus given is gratefully acknowledged in repeated, and sometimes very interesting, letters from the ministers and officers of the congregations.

But surely the contributors to this Fund, and all the congregations of Free Churches, should aim at something higher than the present standard, and should seek to provide a fair competence for our ministers. The struggle, faithfully but with difficulty, maintained through long years by a few self-sacrificing individuals to maintain their minister ought to be supplemented by grants which would free him from wearing anxiety as to the support of his family. The Board would gladly find themselves in a position to make larger grants in many cases where such help would seem justified. As will be seen from a later part of this report, it is their custom to secure, whenever possible, a corresponding increase in the effort of the congregations to provide sufficient stipends. The annual income of the Fund increases so slowly that if the managers are to add to the grants they now make, which average scarcely £25, a considerable and much-needed addition should be made to the income of the Fund.

The grants made during the year 1899 were as follows:—

The conditions referred to in the above list were generally similar in character, urging the congregations in question to meet an increased grant by a corresponding addition, on their own part, to their ministers' stipends. The Board are glad to report that in almost every case these conditions have been accepted, and that these congregations have thus been led to increase, rather than diminish, their own contributions, in consequence of the aid given by the Fund.

The Board have reason to believe that in some cases a minister is appointed in ignorance of the conditions on which your grants are made, and that congregations presume upon again receiving the amount of their previous grant, and actually include such amount in the stipend offered. It cannot be too strongly impressed upon all the beneficiaries of the Fund that its grants are annual only, and renewable or not at the discretion of the Board. If a congregation thus depends on the renewal of its grant, its own energies may relax, and its contribution tend to decrease by the amount of your aid. If that should happen in any case, the very object of the Fund, which is to increase ministers' stipends, would be defeated, and the Fund would degenerate into a machinery for relieving the pockets of the members of the congregation. If this were found to be so, the Board might feel it needful to adopt the plan of the Augmentation Fund, and make no grant at all, or only after the first year of a minister's settlement.

Even where a grant is renewed when a vacant pulpit has been filled, it is not to be expected that the Board will fix the grant to a new and untried man at the amount which it has reached by one or more additions during the satisfactory ministry of a "faithful and efficient" predecessor.

For this, and other reasons, the Board have thought right to make a slight change in their administration of the Fund. Hitherto, where a congregation changed its minister while a grant was current, the remainder of the year's grant was paid at the same rate, provided the minister appointed appeared to the Board to be "faithful and efficient." It is now decided that, whenever the pulpit of an aided congregation becomes vacant, the current grant shall lapse, and an entirely fresh application be made by the congregation.

One of our secretaries in the course of last autumn visited the Irish congregations aided by the Fund. The particulars of his visit were reported at the time in both The Inquirer and the Christian Life newspapers. Most of the congregations are in country places, and the members are scattered over a wide area, so that it is almost impossible to collect them for more than one service, held at mid-day each Sunday, except that some of them hold a second service in the summer months. The Sunday-schools, where they exist, are practically limited to the children of the members, and the attendance, therefore, is not large. The two chapels aided in Belfast have more of the usual character of city churches. There seems reason to hope that a deputation on behalf of the Fund might obtain fresh contributions from Belfast and elsewhere in Ireland by representing that, while the Fund has rendered considerable aid to Irish congregations, it has received but little support from that country.

The amounts of the grants paid during the year exceeds that of 1898 by a sum of £61 10s. 5d., the total distributed being £1,135 9s. 7d. The income of the Fund remains stationary as compared with the previous year. The treasurer had the good fortune to receive two £100 donations—one already referred to in the last report, the other being from an old subscriber, Mr. Henry W. Gair. Following the usual course of capitalising donations and legacies, a small investment in Cape Three Per Cent. Inscribed Stock has been made. The Fund having to mourn an exceptional number of generous donors and subscribers, the Treasurer earnestly pleads for increased support, as not only the numbers of applications increase, but the Board are endeavouring to raise the individual amount of each grant.

The contributors to the Fund have great reason to regret the death of Sir Henry Tate. It is indeed almost indebted for its very existence to one of his early acts of munificence. It was he who, at the conclusion of Mr. Rawson's paper on "Ministers' Stipends" at the Liverpool Conference, immediately offered, through Mr. Joseph Lupton, the generous donation of £1,000, which practically decided the formation of the Fund. He has been a trustee and manager ever since, and the Fund has been indebted to him for advice and guidance as to its investments. While the special remembrance of the contributors must needs be given to one who was thus practically the founder of the Fund, the loss of other generous, and some of them distinguished, contributors must not be overlooked. Mr. J. H. Rowland, of Neath, was an original donor to the Fund, and for some years a member of the Board. The Rev. R. Spears, another subscriber, had given strong expression to his sense of its value. The names of Sir M. P. Manfield, Miss Anna Swanwick, and her sister, Mrs. Bruce, as well as those of Mr. Edward Cobb, Mr. Arthur Greg, Mr. Benjamin Heape, and Mr. John Mahler, were well known in other ways as well as by their support of this Fund. By their death we lose not only their subscriptions, but the countenance of contributors whose very names carried weight. Such losses are severely felt, and it is to be trusted, in accordance with the remarks with which this report opened, that their place will soon be filled by others whose support will be as liberal and as efficient as theirs.

The Treasurer having presented his statement of accounts, this together with the report, was adopted, on the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. D. Martineau.

The President then moved the following resolution :—

The annual meeting of the Sustentation Fund records, on its own behalf and on that of all its subscribers and friends, the sincerest regret at the decease of Sir Henry Tate, Bart. To him is due a deep debt of gratitude. He was the first and most liberal of its promoters, and may indeed be regarded as practically its founder. Many of its subscribers had the honour of his personal friendship, and all appreciated, in the highest degree, his prompt and munificent support.

That this resolution be entered on the minutes, and a copy thereof be forwarded to Lady Tate, with the respectful condolence of the Board with herself and the family.

As one who had not the pleasure of personal acquaintance with Sir Henry Tate, Mr. Long said that he could only express the deep sense of loss sustained not only by their own community, but by the country, in the removal of so munificent a benefactor. Sir Henry was the first and most liberal promoter of that Fund—indeed, he might be called the founder of it.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who seconded, expressed his regret that Mr. Harry Rawson, who had been so intimately associated with Sir Henry Tate, and had drafted the resolution, could not be present to take that place. He himself had known Sir Henry more than forty years ago in Liverpool, and in those days, before he had obtained the vast fortune of his later years, he was one of the most generous supporters of their charitable work. It was not merely because he had much, but because he loved to share with others the benefits he had received. Mr. Steinthal recalled a visit he and Mr. Darbishire had paid to Sir Henry Tate at his London office, when they were beginning the work of the removal of Manchester College to Oxford, and how, after listening quietly what to they had to say and asking a few business-like questions, he had handed a slip of paper across his desk, with a promise of £5,000, at that time the largest donation they had received. And afterwards when they went over the building site at Oxford, and spoke of the importance of having a worthy library, how he had doubled his donation, and gave £10,000, so that they were able to erect the noble Tate Library in the College. No individual could enumerate all his gifts in promotion of education, art, religion, and charity in various ways, but they could speak of the great benefit he had conferred on the community, and they were thankful that his memory would be kept green. No one had more completely exemplified the power of a right spirit in using large means for the true advancement of everything pure and noble in the community.

The resolution was passed, those present standing in silence.

The retiring managers, Messrs. George Brown, Charles Harding, William Long, David Martineau, and Frank Preston, whose term of office had expired, were then re-elected as managers of the Fund.

The resignation of Mr. Ernest W. Enfield having been accepted with regret, Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leicester, was appointed to fill the vacancy thus created on the Board of Management.

The sincere thanks of the contributors were given to Mr. William Long, for his services as President during the past year, and he was elected President for the year 1900.

The thanks of the contributors were also given to Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, the honorary treasurer, and to Messrs. Harry Rawson and A. W. Worthington, the hon. secretaries, and they were re-elected.

The services of Mr. Edwin W. Marshall, as honorary auditor, were gratefully acknowledged, and he was requested to accept the office for the year 1900.

Votes of thanks to the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library and to the President brought the meeting to a close.

Permanent Chapel Building Fund, 1900.—Mr. Odgers has received the following letter from a lady who was formerly for many years resident in Hampstead, and a regular attendant at Rosslyn Hill Chapel :—"Dear Mr. Odgers,—I have often desired to show my gratitude for having been so many years associated with Unitarianism, and I am deeply indebted to its teachings for so much that has enriched, and I hope ennobled, my life. The sweet memory of Dr. Sadler's ministry must ever be a hidden strength to those who knew and loved him. I am glad, therefore, to have this opportunity of assisting to increase the number of Unitarian chapels in London, and to express my sincere desire for their permanent prosperity and usefulness. Unitarians have been very faithful to their convictions, and it is to their fidelity to truth and sweet reasonableness that they are gradually breaking down the dogmas of the old theology, and building up a simple faith and a better way for the spiritual advancement of future generations. In another fifty years I hope our city will be as full of prosperous and progressive Unitarian, or better still 'Free,' chapels as in any city of America. With this hope I enclose my promise of £500 as a donation to the 'Permanent Chapel Building Fund,' which shall be paid in full as soon as possible, certainly not later than the last week in April."

Unless a man takes himself sometimes out of the world, by retirement and self-reflection, he will be in danger of losing himself in the world.—Benjamin Whichcote.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bedfield.—Messrs. E. A. Carlier and J. Salt conducted services here last month. The Sunday-school Christmas-tree party was held on Tuesday, Jan. 30. After tea articles of clothing were presented to the scholars. There are now fifty-one scholars and five teachers. Young Days goes to nearly every home represented, and last year rendered good service by its articles on "Our Unitarian Faith."

Blackpool: South Shore.—On the appointment of the Rev. D. Davis to the Bank-street pulpit, announced last week, the South Shore congregation last Sunday evening passed a resolution of good wishes to the Bank-street congregation and their new minister.

Boston.—The service in Spain-lane Chapel was conducted last Sunday by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., who preached an earnest sermon on "Progression." On the following evening Mr. Shrubsole lectured in the Shodfriars' Hall, on "America's Wonderland," to a large audience.

Cardiff.—On Tuesday, Feb. 6, at the Westgrove Unitarian Church, the minister, the Rev. J. Tyssul Davies was married to Miss Robinson, of Devonport, the service being conducted by the Rev. R. Jenkin Jones.

Chester.—On Sunday evening last a collection of over £4 was made for the Red Cross Society.

Exeter.—On Tuesday, Jan. 30, a sale of work, organised by the members of the Social Circle, took place. It was succeeded on the following evening by a concert in the chapel, arranged by Mr. T. A. Saunders. The object of the sale was to aid the Soldiers' Widows and Orphans Fund, and over £22 was raised for the purpose.

Great Hucklow.—On Wednesday, Jan. 31, in the schoolroom of the Old Chapel, a lantern lecture entitled "My Holiday in Switzerland," was given by the Rev. J. W. Bishop, of Manchester. A very enjoyable evening was spent, and a cordial vote of thanks to the lecturer brought the proceedings to a close.

Kidderminster.—On Jan. 20 the annual meeting of the Sunday-school teachers was held, when the report and balance-sheet were presented and adopted, showing satisfactory results, with 261 scholars. Thanks were given to the officers and especially to Miss J. Badland, who had been superintendent of the girls' school for twenty-one years, and to whom a presentation was made at the scholars' annual soirée. On the evening of Jan. 14, being choir fund Sunday, a selection from the "Messiah" was given. The Young People's Temperance Society, which has been for some years in abeyance, has been re-organised under the guidance of Mr. J. W. Whittaker, with promising results. The history of the "New Meeting," prepared by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, is now in the press.

London: Highgate.—The Rev. J. T. Sunderland has organised a Bible class for the Highgate Sunday-school teachers, and all others who desire to take up the study of the Bible in the light of modern biblical scholarship. The class meets every other Thursday evening in the Church vestry at 8 o'clock. The general subject until June will be "How the Old Testament Grew." The special topics and dates are as follows:—Jan. 25, "The Place of the Old Testament among the World's Sacred Books." Feb. 8, "The Hebrew Land and People: The Old Testament as Literature." Feb. 22, "The Pentateuch: Its Origin and Composite Character—the Polychrome Bible." Mar. 8, "The Connection of Palestine with Babylon, Assyria, and Egypt." Mar. 22, "The Legendary and the Historical Elements of the Old Testament." April 5, "Old Testament Prophecy." April 19, "Old Testament Poetry." May 3, "Text, Apocryphal Literature, Formation of Canon." May 17, "Moral and Religious Progress traceable in the Old Testament—Inspiration, Infallibility, Permanent Value." At each meeting Mr. Sunderland will speak for three quarters of an hour, then half an hour will be devoted to questions and discussion. Everybody welcome.

London: Lewisham.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Jan. 31, with a good attendance. The several reports were hopeful and encouraging. The names of twenty-two new members were added to the roll during the past year, and in the same period the Sunday-school almost doubled its numbers. The Literary and Scientific Society increased its membership, and from September to Christmas had an average weekly attendance of over a hundred. The Dorcas Society is busy with bazaar matters, while the juveniles of the Unity Club have given themselves up to physical culture and the study of music. Mr. S. S. Tayler again presided, and the congregation are sincerely grateful for the support he has given them for the past three years.

London: Stepney-green.—Miss Tagart, the president of the Central Postal Mission, took the chair last Sunday at the monthly postal mission conference held at College Chapel. She gave some very interesting particulars about foreign Unitarian Mission work, especially what is being done in India by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The subject for discussion was an eloquent and earnest paper by Mrs. Southwood Hill, which treated of how Unitarianism was fitted to cope with some of the popular errors of the day: these included:—Agnosticism, Ritualism, Clericalism, Militarism and Mammon Worship. Mrs. Southwood Hill pointed out that the central religious truths held by Unitarians, as taught in the Bible and specially revealed by Jesus Christ—namely, "the Fatherhood of God" and "the Brotherhood of Man," if rightly understood, and faithfully lived out, would combat and destroy that which was evil in the above-named errors. A remarkably animated discussion took place, and a general wish was expressed that the subject should be continued at a future conference. At the evening service, Mr. Lucking Tavener gave an impressive "In Memoriam" address on John Ruskin.

London Unitarian Bazaar.—A social meeting of the Bazaar secretaries, in connection with the London Churches, was held in the Council-room, Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening, Jan. 31. After tea and coffee, Dr. W. Blake Odgers presided, and elicited from the various representatives reports of what had been done, and what might be expected in relation to the furnishing of the different stalls at the approaching Bazaar. It was very gratifying to find that the ladies had been working assiduously, and had already provided by their own labour a quantity of articles of a useful character, besides having obtained from friends contributions both of goods and money. The provincial circles are working earnestly. Wales is determined to do her best. India has also volunteered her help, and will send curios and other specialities. Had it not been for the plague and famine which are now ravaging the land, the members of the Brahmo Somaj would have promised larger contributions, but they will do what they can for the good cause. The following extract from a letter from the Lahore congregation expresses what is felt in other districts:—"We cannot be too thankful to our Unitarian friends in England for all they have done, and are still doing, to help our churches in India; and you can assure them of our sympathy, and of such practical help as we are in a position to render." The London Bazaar will therefore represent the goodwill not only of the liberal churches in our own islands, but liberal religious thinkers and worshippers in the Empire beyond the seas.

London: Wood Green.—On the 30th ult. the society held its annual general meeting, Dr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., in the chair. Every department of Church work showed life, health, and prosperity. Notwithstanding the bad weather the meeting was fairly well attended. On Saturday was a Sunday-school party; prizes were distributed by Mrs. Cowan with gentle words in season. One feature of the entertainment was a lantern show by Messrs. Frank Sudbery and Will Richardson.

Nantwich.—On Wednesday, the 24th ult., the Sunday-school annual prize distribution and concert was held in the schoolroom. Encouraging statistics of improved attendance were given by the superintendent. The Minister, the Rev. J. M. Mills, distrfbuted forty-two prizes and certificates. An excellent programme, consisting of children's plays, drill, recitations, songs, &c., was gone through to the evident satisfaction of a crowded audience of parents and friends. On the Wednesday following the annual winter party was held, when the scholars were regaled with a substantial tea, after which Mr. Mills showed a selection of amusing lantern views, and the teachers led with children's games, all going to make a really enjoyable evening for teachers and scholars alike.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—The following resolution was passed at the monthly meeting held on Feb. 7, the members standing in their places when put to the meeting:—"The Committee of this Association wishes to add their testimony to the inestimable value to the religious world of the life and work of the late Dr. James Martineau, and desires to place on record their appreciation and gratitude for his life and labours, and their sense of the loss sustained by the Unitarian body and the religious world generally by his death."

Pantydefaid.—A new organ was opened here last Sunday morning, it being the gift of the Cardiff Unitarian Church. At the close of the service a resolution was proposed by the Rev. Thomas Thomas, J.P., and seconded by the minister and unanimously adopted, expressing warm and sincere thanks to the Cardiff Church for their kind and generous gift. Miss Thomas, Green Park, ably presided at the organ.

Reading (Resignation). — The Rev. E. A. Voysey has intimated his intention to terminate his ministry here in April next.

Sale.—At the meeting of the social guild on Jan. 31, the Rev. J. Byles, of Northampton, lectured on the "Oberammergau Passion Play."

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—The annual congregational meeting was held last Monday evening, when, in spite of heavy losses by death and removal, a very satisfactory report was presented to the members. The church and its many institutions, comprising Sunday-school, Social Union, Young People's Religious Union, Band of Hope, Ladies' Sewing Society, Mothers' Meeting, Sick and Provident Society are in a healthy condition, and are doing quiet but effective work for good in the neighbourhood. Hearty thanks were accorded to Mr. W. R. Stevenson for his devoted services at the organ and in other capacities; to Mr. J. B. Wostinholm, the treasurer, for his many acts of kindness during the year; to Mr. W. King, secretary, for his painstaking and exemplary work; to the choir and all who have helped the cause by their voluntary work; to the minister (the Rev. John Ellis) for his helpfulness to their spiritual life, and to Mrs. Ellis. A gold watch was presented to Miss Florence Widdowson, who has recently left the choir to accept a professional engagement, as a token of the esteem in which she is held by the congregation. A sum of £20 was voted to the minister, with cordial expressions of appreciation of his services, in supplement of his salary, out of a balance in the treasurer's account. The church is united in close and happy fellowship. On Tuesday evening Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., delivered a lecture on "Swiss Scenery—its Determining Causes," beautifully illustrated by specially prepared lantern slides to a fairly large and most appreciative audience.

Swinton.—The annual prize distribution party was held on Saturday, Feb. 3. After tea, the Rev. W. E. George presided and addressed the scholars and parents. Speeches were also delivered by the superintendents, Messrs. C. Pollitt and L. Jones. The Rev. John Moore, of Hindley, also spoke and recalled pleasant recollections of former prize distributions by reading a list of prize-takers of twenty-one years ago. Mrs. Moore distributed prizes to eighty-three scholars, and eight boxes of sweets to the youngest scholars. An interesting programme was gone through, including the musical play Santa Claus is Coming. The elder scholars have recently given three successful performances of the popular drama, The Lady of Lyons.

Whitchurch.—The annual congregational meeting was held at the Church of the Saviour, on Tuesday, Feb. 6. After tea, the Rev. W. F. Turland presided, and the report of last year's work was adopted. A special vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Gresty, who has acted as treasurer for many years, and who is retiring on account of failing health.

THE article on "The Transfigured Theology of Paradise Lost" in last month's Westminster, though attributed on the cover to "R. Rawlings," is by the Rev. H. Rawlings, M.A., now minister of St. Saviourgate Chapel, York. Milton's great poem has latterly, Mr. Rawlings thinks, been a good deal neglected, because of its obsolete theological structure; but those who recognise that it is to be studied and enjoyed as a work of art, like Lear or Macbeth, find its appeal as powerful as ever. "Paradise Lost is seen to be the revelation of a master mind struggling heroically with a theme not altogether tractable even in his hands, but ennobling it with the splendid riches of his imagination, and throwing broadcast pearls of wise and beautiful speech, which are admirable and helpful for all time."

ECONOMY must be attended to. That's a fundamental, simple honesty; scarce a virtue, but soil for virtues to grow in, soil without which none can grow.—William Smith.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ATTENTION is called to the advertisement of a reading of Hamlet by Mr. J. H. Leigh, at Steinway Hall, on Saturday, March 3, in aid of the London Bazaar Fund. All tickets sold go to the Fund, so it is hoped that many will avail themselves of the opportunity. The play is skilfully shortened to avoid any tediousness, and the reading is set off by some specially arranged incidental music, making altogether a very pleasing entertainment of about two hours. The performance of A Midsummer Night's Dream at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on Jan. 16 resulted in £101 6s. being added to the Fund. Concerts on behalf of the Fund put forward by the Entertainments Committee are being arranged by Miss Winifred Robinson at Essex Hall on March 29, and by Mr. John Harrison at Brixton, of which particulars will be announced later.

THE second instalment of Dr. John Watson's "Life of Jesus Christ," in the February number of the Sunday Strand, deals in three chapters with "The Idyl of Bethlehem," "The Home of Jesus," and The Call of Jesus," which Dr. Watson sees in the awakening experience of the boy's first visit to Jerusalem. These chapters, as it seems to us, show the "Life" to be written, not as a critical study, but for edification. The birth-stories are presented as historical fact, and the Virgin-mother is exalted in a way which leaves an impression of unreality in the home, with the father placed in a dubious position. The chapters are illustrated with present-day scenes in Nazareth and Bethlehem, and as frontispiece Tissot's picture of Christ is given, with his hands upon his heart. Of the symbolic meaning of the Nativity Dr. Watson writes beautifully :—

With the after-look the disciples of Jesus may prefer to see the inner glory of His Nativity rather than its outer circumstances; but no one would desire that these should have been different. Had Jesus been born in a palace, then His birth had not corresponded with His after life, and it would not have been worthy of Himself. For He was to show unto all ages that the greatest force in life is not position nor wealth, but character, and that character is independent of all circumstances, so that goodness, cradled and reared in poverty, without advantages and without favour, persecuted and slain, is yet the most beautiful and triumphant power on earth. Before this infant, so inhospitably received of the world, lay the cruelty of Herod, and the narrow lot of Nazareth, and the homeless mission of Galilee, and the contempt of the great, and the shame of the Cross. But that would be only the appearance of things, not the heart. Around Him also would gather the loyalty of faithful disciples, and the love of women, and the praises of little children, and the gratitude of the poor, and the reverence of holy souls, and the awe of the wicked, and the sympathy of the saints in Paradise, and the service of the mighty angels of God. On Him also would rest, the true aureole for His head, the Spirit of God and the love of His Heavenly Father.

WRITING to the Liverpool Daily Post with reference to Mrs. Humphry Ward's letter on "The New Reformation," from which we quoted last week, the Rev. T. W. M. Lund, the liberal chaplain of the Church of the Blind, pointed to the real obstacle to any such progressive movement in the stolid indifference of the great masses of the people to the higher interests of thought. The men and women of progress, Mr. Lund says, are not as a rule found in Anglican churches, and the reforming clergyman has a single-handed fight to make, with the sympathy chiefly of outsiders, and with little chance of promotion. This is noted as one of the gravest hindrances to the supply of an enlightened clergy, and as largely responsible for the present deterioration in the number and quality of the men taking orders.

The time is critical. If the Church is to be the Church of the intelligent people of England, the intelligent people must stand by her, and make their voices and influence felt in regard to the need of free criticism, rational exegesis, and the dominance of spiritual over dogmatic teaching. I see no other chance of drawing into the clerical ranks men of original and independent mind, who can appreciate the value of the new learning of our time, and apply it wisely and tactfully in their guidance of public feeling. Without some such help, the Church will become the property of the least educated portion of the nation; I mean that self-satisfied class of intellectual mediocrity who will be content to stand where they are while the word rolls on, quite indifferent to the trenchant axiom of Dr. Mivart :—"We must be true to science as well as to religion," and quite ignorant that what they believe has long ceased to have any weight with the intelligence of the age because the ground has been cut from beneath its feet.

I fear we are a long way from accepting any such modification of dogmatic test for Church membership as Mrs. Ward suggests. Lord Halifax represents the belief of far more than his own party when he says that the Virgin birth is the foundation-stone of Christianity. There is a good deal of materialism of a very earthly kind still clinging to our religion. It will take some years of Mrs. Ward's classes to get behind it. She will find the foundation-stones of the Church are not identical with those of Christ. She is concerned to create a passionate devotion to great ethical principles, which will build up a fine quality of human character and a noble race of men. His followers generally substitute for this motive abstruse metaphysical beliefs about the person of Christ; how He came into the world; how He went out of it; how far He was miraculously different from the race. He came to save—the race he declared He came to make like Himself. If His own word counts for anything, as far as it is reported to us, then it is in personal attachment to Him and all that He spiritually was that we shall find our fullest life.

THE Rev. J. Foster, B.A., D.C.L., rector of Authorpe, writes, in the Louth and North Lincolnshire News of Feb. 3, a column of Reminiscence and Tribute to Dr. Martineau. Years ago, before he had determined to take orders in the Church, Mr. Foster, when staying in a certain city, was attracted into what seemed to him a "parochial church."

Brought up in the straightest orthodox faith, living amongst friends zealously strict in maintaining that faith, I found when I entered that church that I had wandered "far from home"—I was attracted by the novelty, the simplicity, the quiet of the religious service. I stayed to the close. The preacher's face, voice, and some parts of the sermon are as fresh and distinct to-day as they were years ago. I shall never forget the impression made upon my youthful mind. The face with its intense thoughtfulness and radiant spirituality; the voice musical, low, clear, and strong with a haunting sweetness; the sermon, too lofty for me at times to follow, yet so contemplative, soothing, soaring, and steeped in intellectual pathos that I was lifted into a new world of thought and being. It fitted into the mood of my life. Then I could say with Novalis "my spirit awoke."

All was so utterly unlike anything I had been accustomed to; no hard narrow mercantile views of religion; no sentimental parodies or platitudes.

"Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken."

The burden and the text of that sermon was "The God of the Living." Persistently, as the line of Virgil to Savonarola, or the phrase of St. Augustine to Cardinal Newman, did that sermon recur to my mind. Philosophy with its entrancing fascination, and theology the "queen of sciences" through that sermon won my devotion and love.

Mr. Foster's friends were horrified when they heard at whose feet he had been sitting, but so began a life-long indebtedness "to one who has stimulated and enlightened and braced my mental history." Mr. Foster prints in his article some extracts from letters he received from Dr. Martineau. The first quotation is thus introduced:—

The following extracts may be of interest to all who seek for that spiritual union which comes "from the quiet of a large sympathy," but which is destroyed when we fan "the heat of a narrow antipathy." Dr. Martineau once wrote me:—"Though held by conscientious conviction to a Nonconformist position I have always looked with venerating affection on the Church of England which excludes me from her communion and which it is your privilege to serve. And it cannot but be consolatory to me in my involuntary exile to find that in the depths of the religious life we come upon possibilities of fellowship which even ecclesiastical organisations disown. If our English Christendom could be relieved of its over-charge of dogma and surrendered to the sublime and lovely conditions of the spiritual life as presented in the "Imitatio Christi," the national unity would assume a reality and power of which we can now hardly conceive. Some such dream came upon me in early years and still lingers with me on the verge of my ninetieth year.

And this one other passage we must give:—

It is particularly grateful to me to receive on the threshold of my ninetieth year a benedictory word from a minister of a Church to which I have always yearned to belong but which visits such as I am oftener with anathema than with blessing. Sure I am that in our "heart of hearts" and in the ultimate readings of our intellectual thought we reach a sacred ground of unity and fellowship which once touched will put to shame our superficial differences and antipathies. To those who share in this conviction and confess it in the spirit of their life I am drawn with unspeakable affection.

We published last week the resolution passed by the Committee of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, after the death of Dr. Martineau. We are now permitted to add the letter he wrote in response to the greetings of his old congregation, on the occasion of his ninetieth birthday in 1895. The letter was addressed to Mr. Joseph Coventry, at that time chairman of the congregation:—

Though the twenty-five years of my residence in Liverpool can claim no numerical preponderance in the reckoning of my ninety years, they contain for me, as my thought measures their contents, far more than half of the experiences, the labours, and the probation, of life. Within that period lies all that was most intense in aim, in energy, in suffering; and those who were near me then could not but know all my work and all its weaknesses, and read me through and through. That the survivors among them, with their successors, should be able and impelled to send me such a message of affection as you transmit to me, is the most cheering experience which can brighten the close of my last decade. I am deeply grateful for it to my known and unknown friends, and pray you to convey to them my response of thanks and benediction.

With reference to the questions asked of Mr. Ambrose Bennett last week by M. Hocart, we hope very shortly to publish an article by Mr. Bennett on the subject.

Note of Warning.—It appears that Mr. Vincent Taylor, writing from Adys-road, East Dulwich, is using lists of names taken from The Inquirer in sending out begging letters. Anyone receiving a communication from him had better communicate with the Charity Organisation Society, 15, Buckingham-street, W.C., before responding to Mr. Taylor's appeal.

DR. MARTINEAU AND THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

A correspondent contributed to the Manchester Guardian of Jan. 17 the following interesting notes:—

There is not, so far as I know, any discussion of the ethics of temperance in any of Dr. Martineau's set dissertations. Nevertheless, we have some record of his views on the subject, if only by way of obiter dicta. In 1882 Mr. Arthur A. Reade, when compiling his book on "Study and Stimulants" (second edition, Abel Heywood, Manchester, 1883), addressed certain questions to various eminent persons as to their experience. Among other replies he received one from Dr. Martineau dealing with his own personal habits. Of tobacco he had an "intense dislike," and his distaste for it, he says, "has restricted my travelling to a minimum and kept me from all public places where I am liable to encounter its sickening effects." As to alcohol the narrative is more varied. In the forties he was for about seven years a total abstainer. To this period belongs what is possibly Dr. Martineau's only recorded speech on the temperance question. It was reprinted in The Inquirer about half a century later. In referring to Dr. Philip Carpenter's complaint that the influential classes kept aloof from the temperance movement, Dr. Martineau said:—

The blame is not all on one side. In reading the temperance periodicals, which must be regarded as the organs of the body, I have seen with pain a superstitious abhorrence manifested towards the substance alcohol, instead of directing that abhorrence towards the moral vice in the mind of the drinker. You cannot persuade old persons who have used these liquors with moderation all their lives that there is anything in them so very horrid. I admit that, as a cure for enormous evils, teetotalism is necessary; so that for many years I have adopted the practice in my own person and family. But others are driven away by such language. The feeling of superstitious dread of the substance itself has led to physiological exaggeration respecting its effects. It is dangerous to make such statements when persons see their neighbours taking it and living for seventy or eighty years. And yet I believe fully that its use is mischievous rather than beneficial, and that everyone would be better if he totally abstained.

After referring to the evils wrought by intemperance, he proceeds:—

The teetotalers are quite right in saying to every man who is liable to guilty excess that he must go the whole length of total abstinence. To diminish the quantity inch by inch is utterly hopeless and ridiculous. They must throw aside whatever sets temptation to work, else in nine instances out of ten they must fail. It follows that the old temperance [moderation] societies must, in the nature of things, fail in their object. I go one step further. Must everyone else stop?—(Cries of "Yes.") I also believe with you that that is the proper and true course. But you should do so on the true principle. If we say to drunkards "You must stop, but I won't," then they will be all banded together into a drunkards' society. This brands them; at once they stick a bad character on their own back, which is more than we can expect to be done, especially by those who are not yet in a moral state and are incapable of performing a severe penance. Therefore I think that those disposed to aid should aid, and say, "We also, in order to help you, will totally abstain." But it should be done avowedly for that purpose; not on the ground that moderate drinkers have been previously committing sin. But no moderate drinker can say that it is his duty to drink. He is quite at liberty to give it up. He should say, "I give it up, in order to help my weak brother." This is a sound principle, and there is no other on which the enforcement of teetotalism can be based. But this principle does convince me powerfully. I would therefore suggest to our Chairman that he would do well to make the sacrifice and bear the weight of his character and condition to the respectability of the society. It is a little sacrifice. It is perfectly absurd to stick so much at throwing it aside. Persons would be better in health, clearer in mind, and almost all the functions of life, on which physical enjoyment depends, would go on as well, or better. And even were it otherwise that man is a poor philanthropist and Christian who will not even let down a little of health to raise others to a better condition.

Dr. Martineau expressed his own dislike of the pledge, and urged the necessity for counter-attractions to the public-house. "We cannot carry on anything on negative principles," is his characteristic remark. Like his good friend Dr. Philip Carpenter, he desired converts to "the whole of temperance, the moral administration of the whole life, as well as from the particular tendency to drink." In 1849 Dr. Martineau had an illness, and, under medical advice, took daily a small quantity of vin ordinaire, but on the appearance of gout he resumed for many years his former abstinent habits. He was not, he is careful to add, "under any vow, but practically not taking more than half a dozen glasses of wine per annum." At seventy-seven the only abatement of his strength that he noted was "that a given task required a somewhat longer time than in former days." In more recent years it was understood that Dr. Martineau had again, under medical orders, made use of some small measure of stimulant. But it will be seen that the whole drift of his sympathies has been on the side of abstinence and temperance. This is emphatically shown by the closing words of his letter to Mr. Reade. "I will only add," he says, "that I have never found the slightest difficulty, physical or moral, in an instantaneous change of habit to complete abstinence. Instead of feeling any depressing want of what I had relinquished, I have found a direct refreshment and satisfaction in the simpler mode of life. Few things, I believe, do more, at a minimum of cost, to lighten the spirits and sweeten the temper of families and of society than the repudiation of artificial indulgences."

ROGER ASCHAM.—I.

IT is a somewhat curious coincidence that one seems lured to apostrophise every man named Roger, in the endearing terms employed by Dean Swift upon a notable occasion—"Dearly beloved Roger." Had the Dean's servant been named by any other name, it may reasonably be doubted whether he would have proceeded with the service that day. From Roger Infans to Sir Roger de Coverley, the race of Rogers is a dearly beloved race, and the greatest and most dearly beloved Roger of them all, not forgetting Roger Bacon, is Roger Ascham, Queen Elizabeth's tutor, the "scholemaster," the lover of "the booke and the bowe." Roger Ascham was a great Yorkshireman, having been born at Kirby Wiske, near Northallerton. He was taught in his youth by the greatest English teacher, the famous Sir John Cheeke, of whom Milton speaks as having taught Cambridge and King Edward Greek. He followed in the footsteps of Sir John Cheeke, and became in due course the Public Orator, i.e., Latin Orator of Cambridge University, and in due time became "to his undying delight," the instructor of the most noble scholar within the realm, the Princess Elizabeth, and read with her Latin and Greek when she was Queen, of which languages, under his tuition, she had become perfect master, understanding and speaking Latin with facility. Here, indeed, is the passage from the first part of his book called "The Schoolmaster," in which he refers to Queen Elizabeth's mastery of languages. At the time of his writing his book, she was thirty years of age: that was in 1563, the year before the birth of Shakespeare. After saying that "if King Edward had lived a little longer, his example alone had bred such a race of worthy learned gentlemen as this Realme never yet did afforde," he goes on—

> Yet there is one example for all gentlemen of this Court to follow, that may well satisfy them, or nothing will serve them, nor no example move them to goodness and learning. It is your shame (I speak to you all, you young gentlemen of England) that one maid should go beyond you all, in excellency of learning, and knowledge of divers tongues. Point forth six of the best given gentlemen of this Court, and all they together show not so much good will, spend not so much time, bestow not so many hours, daily, orderly, and constantly, for the increase of learning and knowledge, as doth the Queen's Majesty herself. Yea, I believe that beside her perfect readiness in Latin, Italian, French and Spanish, she readeth here now at Windsor more Greek every day than some Prebendary of the Church doth read Latin in a whole week. And that which is most praiseworthy of all, within the walls of her privy chamber, she hath obtained excellency of learning to understand, speak and write, both wittily with the head and fair with the hand, as scarce one or two rare wits in both the Universities have in many years reached unto. Amongst all the benefits that God hath blessed me withal next the knowledge of Christ's true Religion, I count this the greatest, that it pleased God to call me, to be one poor minister in setting forward these excellent gifts of learning in this most excellent Prince. Whose example alone, if the rest of our nobility would follow, then might England be, for learning and wisdom in nobility, a spectacle to all the world beside.

Surely Roger Ascham had done his duty as schoolmaster or tutor nobly by the Queen, and she must have reckoned him and his method of teaching amongst her chief blessings, for if knowledge is power, and such masterly knowledge as was hers, she stood on a level with the foremost men of her time, and the language in which some of these speak of her attainments seems excessive till we read such words as these of her own tutor. But it is also true that at this time women's education, at least in certain quarters, stood at a very high degree of perfection, in part due, no doubt, to the great impetus given to all learning, especially of the classical languages, by the Reformation. From this same book of "The Schoolmaster" is taken that other famous passage referring to Roger Ascham's interview with Lady Jane Grey, she who was destined to be, in a few years after the date of this conversation, the unhappy Queen of England for thirteen days, the luckless tool and victim of her ambitious and unscrupulous relatives. Roger Ascham is illustrating the power of love as against fear in education, and by way of illustration recalls a conversation he had with Lady Jane Grey:—

> And one example [he says] whether love or fear doth work more in a child, for virtue or learning, I will gladly report; which may be heard with some pleasure, and followed with more profit. Before I went into Germany, I came to Brodegate, in Leicestershire, to take my leave of that noble Lady Jane Grey, to whom I was exceeding much beholding. Her parents the Duke and Duchess, with all the household, gentlemen and gentlewomen, were hunting in the park; I found her in her chamber reading Plato's Phædo in Greek, and that with as much delight as some gentlemen would read a merry tale in Boccaccio. After salutation, and duty done, with some other talk, I asked her why she would leave such pastime in the park? Smiling, she answered me: "I wis all their sport in the park is but a shadow to that pleasure I find in Plato. Alas! good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant." "And how came you, madam," quoth I, "to this deep knowledge of pleasure, and what did chiefly allure you unto it, seeing not many women, but very few men, have attained thereunto?" "I will tell you," quoth she, "and tell you a truth, which perchance you will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits that ever God gave me, is that he sent me sharp and severe parents and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand or go, eat, drink, be merry or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing anything else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure and number, even so perfectly as God made the world, or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, and sometimes punished in ways I will not name for the honour I bear them, so without measure misordered, that I think myself in hell, till time come, that I must go to Mr. Aylmer, who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing whilst I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping, because whatsoever I do else but learning is full of grief, trouble, fear and whole misliking unto me. And this my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure and more that in respect of it all other pleasures in very deed be but trifles and troubles unto me." "I remember this talk gladly," says Roger Ascham, "both because it is worthy of memory, and because, also, it was the last talk that I ever had and the last time that ever I saw that noble worthy lady!"

It is delightful to read how gentle were the giants of those days, especially these giants of schoolmasters. With what tenderness his pupils spoke of that man of vast and profound learning, Sir John Cheeke; how charming is this testimony of Lady Jane Grey to Mr. Aylmer's ways with her; and Robert Ascham seems the very embodiment of the spirit that would rule by love and not by fear. One great axiom of his in teaching was this: "That a child shall take more profit of two faults, gently warned of, than of four things rightly hit." The first book of his "Schoolmaster," which may be considered as introductory to the real subject of his book—namely, how to teach Latin in the readiest way—is gemmed with beautiful passages, insisting upon the prior need to teach by love and not by fear. This view was new in those days, and so Ascham had to explain "why, in his opinion, love is fitter than fear, gentleness than beating, to bring up a child rightly in learning." "Some men," he says, "laugh at us, when we thus wish and reason that young children should be rather allured to learning by gentleness and love, than compelled to learning by beating and by fear." Ascham brings his answer to these people from Socrates:—

> In those days Socrates, Plato, Aristotle appeared to men as a final Court of Appeal; and surely in most things that have to do with truth, justice, and humanity no better High Court of Appeal could be found. The judgment of Socrates, said Ascham, was that "no learning ought of be learned with bondage." "Some men," continues Ascham, "friendly enough of nature, but of small judgment in learning, do think I take too much pains, and spend too much time, in setting forth these children's affairs. But those good men were never brought up in Socrates' school, who saith plainly, that no man goeth about a more godly purpose than he that is mindful of the good bringing-up, both of his own and other men's children. In writing this book, I have had earnest respect to three special points—truth of religion, honesty in living, right order in learning. In which three ways, I pray God, my poor children may diligently walk . . . for whose sake I was the willinger to take these pains."

As one reads this delightful schoolmaster's book, which is at once simple in its statement, lovingly gentle in its intention, and yet gliding like a big ship into a vast and deep ocean of learning by easy yet sound methods, one feels that the saying about poets applies to schoolmasters—that they are born, not made. The first book—the first voyage with this captain of learning—is a very delightful trip indeed; the second book—the second voyage—is more distinctly a matter of serious business, and the chief pleasure comes in overcoming, in a manful, orderly, stately way, the manifold difficulties of the elements of language and of the deep and wide expanse of classical literature. The book was written more especially for little Robert Sackville, the grandson of Sir Richard Sackville; and the story of how it came about throws much light upon the book, upon the times, upon some other of the great men of the times, and upon Ascham himself. In 1563 Ascham was dining with Sir William Cecil, Sir Richard Sackville and others, who formed "a company," says Ascham, "of so many wise and good men together, as hardly then could have been picked out again out of all England beside." The conversation turned to the subject of education, from news of the running away of some boys from Eton, where there was much beating. Ascham argued that "young children were sooner allured by love than driven by beating to obtain good learning." "Mr. Secretary (Sir William Cecil) said very wisely, and most truly, that many young wits be driven to hate learning before they know what learning is," and he instanced his own unfortunate early experience. Sir Richard Sackville said nothing at the dinner-table, but he afterwards drew Ascham aside, agreed with his opinions, lamented his own past loss by a harsh schoolmaster, and said: "Seeing it is but in vain to lament things past, and also wisdom to look to things to come, surely God willing, if God lend me life, I will make this, my mishap, some occasion of good hap to little Robert Sackville, my son's son. For whose bringing up I would gladly, if it so please you, use specially your good advice. I hear say you have a son much of his age (Ascham had three little sons): we will deal thus together." Well, Sir Richard agreed to pay the schooling, and that right handsomely, of all four for the privilege of Ascham's guidance. And further, Ascham undertook "to put in some order of writing the chief points of this our talk, concerning the right order of teaching and honesty of living, for the good bringing-up of children and young men." Roger Ascham, though he died comparatively young, at the age of fifty-three, lived five years after this conversation, and had completed his book, which was published after his death, and dedicated to Sir William Cecil. The story of the origin of this book, "The Schoolmaster," brings delightfully near, and makes very real, this grand yet simple age of Elizabeth. Roger Ascham's aims and methods were meant to make true kings and queens of all amenable, docile children, to make them gentle, to give their minds breadth and depth, sound judgment based on extensive and profound knowledge. That he succeeded we have record. That he could have succeeded might, in lieu of that, have been sufficiently proved from his success with such a woman and such a Queen as Elizabeth. Spacious, indeed, were the days of Elizabeth, and spacious of soul and great-hearted the gentlemen who taught her, guided her, and fought for her, and over whom she ruled and reigned, but the greatest of these, essentially, was the gentlest of her teachers—her dearly beloved Roger. Thus much of Roger Ascham, Bibliophilus; we turn next to Roger Ascham "Toxophilus" — from Ascham the Aged to Ascham the Youth, and from the reign of Elizabeth to that of her father, Henry VIII. Cedant arma togae, concedat laurea linguae.

LOVE would light our path to heaven,
Mortals groping miss its gleam,
To their stature dwarf God's greatness,
Call their creeds His law supreme.

Radiance borrowed from above
Tells that heaven can know no bound marks,
Tells to us that God is Love.

LITERATURE.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA.*

FROM several points of view the appearance of the "Biblical Encyclopædia" is an interesting and hopeful sign of the times. It is a proof that serious study of Holy Scripture, in spite of the manifold distractions offered by modern life, is pursued with an ardour and thoroughness which have never been surpassed, which have perhaps been scarcely equalled in the more leisurely days of our fathers. So true is it that men do most when they have least time to do it in, and that eagerness in one kind of knowledge stimulates curiosity in all, provokes generous rivalry, and sets a high standard of excellence. We live in an age characterised by dazzling achievements in physical science. Yet classical scholarship instead of losing has gained in precision on the one hand, in a sense of the connection between all great literature on the other. In like manner the Bible has shared to the full in all the gain of improved methods and accumulated knowledge. This interest, moreover, is by no means confined to scholars by profession: it is very widely spread. It would be easy to illustrate this fact from recent publications in Germany: for England we have evidence enough in two large works which are in course of publication just now—namely, Clarke's "Bible Dictionary" and Black's "Biblical Encyclopædia." Each of these books is on a very great scale and cannot, therefore, be sold except at a high price. Yet well-known publishers have undertaken the risks involved, have secured the co-operation of numerous writers, many of whom hold the first rank in their respective subjects, and have spared no cost to issue these large books in the most appropriate form, well printed and with excellent maps and woodcuts. We may also observe with satisfaction the new place which England holds in Biblical research. Only thirty years ago English commentators on the Bible were practically ignored on the Continent. Now, however, we find names among the contributors to the "Biblical Encyclopædia," whose work need not fear comparison with the best that Germany can produce. Such are Canon Sanday, Canon Robinson, Canon Driver, Dr. G. A. Smith, Mr. King; nor is it to be forgotten that the chief editor has himself made a vast number of important contributions. It is further a significant fact that such a work should be edited by a dignitary of the National Church. For whatever the faults of the "Encyclopædia" may be, excessive caution or compromise is not among them, and yet so perfect is the freedom which the Church now allows, that the opinions expressed are not likely to meet with any denunciation from those whose words carry weight, though of course they have met, and no doubt will continue to meet, with intelligent criticism. We ought to add, before closing these general remarks, that Canon Cheyne has secured the services of well-known German scholars, and that their articles have been done into very good and readable English.

Of course, the primary use of the "Biblical Encyclopædia" will consist in supplying the defects of private libraries. To many probably who do not make the critical study of the Bible a chief object, the "Encyclopædia" will take the place of a Biblical library. But indeed the work is so elaborate, and in many respects so exhaustive, that no one can well afford to neglect it. It contains, e.g., abundant reference to those numerous periodicals and reports in which scholars, especially German scholars, communicate discoveries or make critical suggestions. These are apt to be forgotten, and everyone, therefore, will gratefully welcome the toil devoted to furnishing references and supplying a conspectus of literature at the end of all the important articles. Moreover, the articles are so elaborate, that they are often as good as, or better than, anything to be found elsewhere, e.g., in manuals of archæology or in general introductions. We would call particular attention to Mr. Hogg's article on "Agriculture," and to those on "Babylonia and Assyria," by Mr. King. These, of course, have the advantage of being new, and so abreast of recent discoveries. Again, the article on "Chronology" is important, both in itself, and also because it is hard except in a dictionary or encyclopædia to find any account which embodies all recent researches in Biblical and particularly New Testament questions of date. Further, with respect to the Books of the Bible, we have commentaries and introductions in abundance. Nevertheless, one turns to Canon Driver's article* on "Chronicles," with the certainty that we are in safe hands. It is, indeed, hard to imagine a more perfect piece of work. When we say that it is full, accurate, judicial, we are only saying what every one will take for granted and no one needs to be told. It is, perhaps, more worthy of note that it is written in a delightful style, and that it will interest and attract even those who come to it with little previous knowledge of the subject.

It has been objected—and, as we think, with reason—that the tone of some articles in the "Encyclopædia" is too trenchant and confident. The general reader should consult as a very necessary counteractive the excellent Bible Dictionary edited by Dr. Hastings, and assuredly he will be ill advised should he accept such an article as Schmiedel's on the "Acts of the Apostles" as if it afforded a fair and complete view of the criticism of the book in its present stage. At the same time he will find here and there views which may at their first presentation seem startling, but are nevertheless well founded on solid fact. For example, it is, we think, a very great merit in Canon Cheyne's article on the "Ark of the Covenant," that by adopting a view ably stated some time ago by Kosters it enables us to understand the real history of the Ark under Saul and David, though it compels us to reject that traditional story of its restitution by the Philistines which has hitherto obtained general credence. In conclusion we would call attention to the valuable articles of Canon Robinson on the "Canon of the New Testament," on the "Church," and on "Bishops." They differ to some extent from the views for which Hatch and Harnack have secured a wide popularity; but this result is not to be attributed necessarily to ecclesiastical bias; it may be due to the fact that Canon Robinson takes all the data into account and is not carried away by the allurement of compact theory. We cannot help regretting that the Old Testament has secured fuller and more minute description than the New, but it was natural that the editor's chief attention should be turned to the subject on which he himself has laboured with such long and indefatigable industry and with such brilliant success.

SHORT NOTICES.

In two sermons entitled "Helps to Belief in God," the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., has pointed out in a very striking way the large extent to which the objects of Nature which we regard as material are really constituted by the perceiving mind; and in this fact he finds strong evidence for a theistic reading of the evolution of the universe. There can be no doubt that to very many of his hearers Mr. Jacks' words must have come with all the interest of a new revelation, and, to say the least of it, will have given them most timely and welcome help towards throwing off that incubus of materialism which in this scientific age often presses with stifling effect on religious faith. Mind, argues Mr Jacks, is necessarily mixed up with everything, and contributes to every object an essential part of the qualities which make it what it is. If, then, the Nature which we now see around us owes so much of its being to the mind which perceives it, it is only reasonable to infer that all through the process of cosmical evolution, even when no human thought as yet existed, Divine Thought gave to each geologic stage its complete reality and its intelligible character. As Mr. Jacks himself admits, it was Bishop Berkeley's celebrated dictum that the esse of things is constituted by their percipi, which first started him on this interesting line of reflection. He does not, however, entirely follow the great Bishop's lead; for he maintains that there is more in material objects than the part which the mind contributes; and we are inclined to think that if he were to fully work out the fertile suggestions contained in these able discourses, he would be ultimately led, not to Berkeley's Idealism, but rather to some such Ideal-realism as is described in the writings of the profound thinker, Lotze. But evidently the author's immediate aim will be gained, if his thoughtful words serve, as we believe they do, to lift the minds of their readers above a shallow materialism and to produce the conviction that even "matter and force—those primitive elements which some persons have thought render God unnecessary—cannot be conceived as existing apart from the activity of an Eternal Mind." In his Address on "Jerome and the Vulgate," at the opening of the present session of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, the Rev. J. E. Manning has given us a lucid, scholarly and most readable account of the biblical labours of the great Latin Father. The influence of Jerome's Version, commonly known as the Vulgate, has been so great, its authority so universally accepted in the past, that it is impossible to understand the history of our own English Versions of the Bible without some knowledge of Jerome's work. Students will find in Mr. Manning's Address an excellent introduction to the study of the Vulgate.

The analysis of Jerome's personality, as a man and a scholar, is just and, on the whole, sympathetic. That he was the greatest Biblical scholar which the Western Church produced before the revival of learning at the end of the Middle Ages—the Origen of the West, as he has sometimes been called—cannot be disputed; that "with many blemishes and not a few weaknesses of character," as Mr. Manning says, "he was a great man," no one will doubt who has made himself familiar with his voluminous writings.

To see Jerome as he was, we must especially read his Letters in which, while pourtraying the life of his age, he has even more faithfully pourtrayed himself.

In his remarks upon the decree of the Council of Trent, Mr. Manning touches upon a curious and highly interesting question, curious and interesting not only for special theological students, but also for those who, on broader grounds, are seeking for "the seat of authority in religion." It was easy enough for the Council to direct that there should be an authorised edition of the Bible, but to produce such an edition was much more difficult. After two memorable attempts, a standard edition was indeed published, but its text, in spite of the Sixtine declaration that it must be held as "true, legitimate, authentic and unquestioned," remains still open to much revision and correction. The decree of the Council of Trent which was expected to give the world the sure benefit of Jerome's noble labours, in reality has led to a state of things which may satisfy the theologians of a certain school, but must appear very deplorable to true scholars.

When we consider the methods by the help of which Jerome accomplished his translation of the Bible, we distinctly recognise in it a monument of progress; but infallible wisdom has decreed that no further progress is to be made by a continued application of the same methods. It is this attitude towards the irresistible claims of growing knowledge which undoubtedly constitutes the weak spot in the armour of the old Church, for which, fifteen hundred years ago, Jerome laboured, under a better inspiration, so faithfully and so well.

Those influences which come out from a man, whether he will or no, and often beyond his conscious knowledge, reveal his real character, and constitute the highest or the meanest work he does in God's world. No hard, dry, didactic moralist can exert such an influence; whoever touches the hearts of his fellow-men with a love of divine goodness must have deep and sweet human sympathies. He must not only be pure himself, he must be lovingly patient with mortal infirmities. To be a giver of good advice is one thing, to be a man in whose presence an evil word cannot be spoken is another.—Henry W. Crosskey.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association was held at the Unitarian Institute, Liverpool, on Thursday, Feb. 9., the President, Mr. J. Coventry in the chair. There were also present the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, L. de B. Klein, H. W. Hawkes, J. C. Hirst, R. S. Redfern, J. E. Stead (Delegate from the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission); the Hon. Mrs. Klein, Mrs. Burroughs; Messrs. C. W. Jones, A. S. Thew, and others. Letters were read from Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Rev. W. J. Jupp, and Mr. R. Robinson regretting their inability to be present.

The report of the Committee and of the work at Crewe, Bootle, Liscard, and Garston, together with a letter from the Rev. J. L. Haigh, as to Hamilton-road Domestic Mission, and the treasurer's balance-sheet, had been previously printed and circulated.

The report noted the steady work of the Rev. R. S. Redfern at Crewe, under difficult circumstances, and with regret recorded the resignation by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, of the pulpit of the Bootle Free Church, after nine years of devoted service. During the year the Memorial Church at Liscard had been opened, the gift of Mrs. W. Elam, who had also provided for the furnishing, and had set aside £1,000 as the nucleus of an endowment fund, primarily for the augmentation of the minister's stipend. The progress at Hamilton-road Domestic Mission had been very encouraging. At Garston services had been regularly held, largely with lay help, and with prospect of the growth of a permanent congregation. The Committee with prosperous finances, in view of the enlarging scope of their activity, contemplated the appointment of a missionary minister.

The report of the Rev. R. S. Redfern from Crewe spoke of the benefit derived from the Barker Legacy, and recorded a gratifying increase in the numbers and efficiency of the Sunday-school. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes, writing of his resignation of the Bootle pulpit in the summer, expressed his intention of remaining a member of the congregation, and aiding the new minister, who, he hoped, would enter on his duties in September. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas recorded an increase of thirty-one members on the roll of the Liscard congregation, making a total of 112, and the taking up again of various activities in the new buildings, and also the organising of a gymnasium for men, and for boys and girls. The treasurer's statement showed an expenditure of £355 15s. 1d., leaving a balance in hand of £118 6s. 6d.; subscriptions and donations amounted to £226 19s., congregational collections to £113 14s. From the trustees of Prescot Chapel the Association received £43, from the trustees of Ormskirk Chapel £21 5s.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and the treasurer's statement, said that only those who lived and worked at Crewe could estimate the difficulties of the position and the noble work that was being done there by the Rev. R. S. Redfern and the congregation. There had been great improvement at Hamilton-road, now organised as a Domestic Mission, where the Association had so long failed to obtain satisfactory results, though helped by the best ministers. The Sunday-school there had over 400 scholars. The loss of the Rev. H. W. Hawkes at Bootle would be very great. He expressed their gratification at the completion of the Liscard Memorial Church.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, in seconding, said the work of the Association was at the highest point of efficiency, and at Hamilton-road, where for a long time there had been difficulties, they had now a great success. In a few years they might be speaking of the similar success of their work at Garston.

The Rev. Dr. KLEIN then moved:—

That in receiving the reports of the Revs. R. S. Redfern, H. W. Hawkes, and J. M. Lloyd Thomas from Crewe, Bootle and Liscard respectively, the members of this Association record their sense of the great importance of the work, for the support of which they are themselves largely responsible, and their sympathy with those who are practically engaged in these efforts to extend the influence of a liberal religious faith and life, and are pleased to note the more permanent character of the Garston congregation.

Their work, he said, had a special importance at that time, as opposed to the growing sacerdotal element so prevalent to-day. He felt that the message of the divine spirit of faith and trust and love which was being given to the people by their ministers was the best influence in the growth of the ideal spiritual life.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, in seconding, said the work of that Association was as much needed as ever in spite of or together with the movement for a "New Reformation" in the Church of England.

The Revs. R. S. REDFERN and H. W. HAWKES replied.

The Rev. J. E. STEAD, in proposing the Committee for the ensuing year, compared the work as far as he knew it of the two Associations, and longed to have a Renshaw-street collection in the district he represented.

The Rev. J. C. HIRST, in seconding, spoke specially of the work at Garston, where he had conducted the services for some months. The numbers were not large, but there was a band of earnest people, who highly valued the services, and he thought the work was well worth encouragement and support.

Mr. A. S. THEW proposed, and Major EVANS seconded, a vote of thanks to the Chairman for his services as President for the last two years, and as Chairman that night.

Annual collections in aid of the funds of the Association are to be made simultaneously on Sunday, March 18.

WE look at our burdens and heavy loads and shrink from them. But as we lift them and bind them about our hearts they become wings, and on them we rise, and soar towards God. There is no burden which, if we lift it cheerfully, and bear it with love in our heart, will not become a blessing to us. God means our tasks to be helpers heavenwards. To shrink from a duty, or to refuse to bend our shoulders to receive a load, is to decline a new opportunity for growth.—J. R. Miller.

THE WAR—FROM A HIGHER POINT OF VIEW.

SIR,—You have from time to time opened the columns of THE INQUIRER to articles and letters dealing with the present war, and the matter has been discussed from "both sides," as the phrase goes.

There is, however, I venture to submit, another point of view, and a higher one, than that which has hitherto been taken; from which a vision may be gained, which has in it, as I think, a certain element of consolation.

Battle is, indeed, a terrible thing. We feel it to be a terrible thing, because death, which comes to all in time, is there seen concentrated, and picking off the flower of the nation; and suffering, also, which all, at some time or other, are called upon to bear, is there seen multiplied and intensified, just as we may see it in any hospital. But then, too, a war such as that in which we are now engaged brings out in either nation the deep-lying feelings of unselfishness; it brings to the surface the underlying unity; all are feeling deep and real sympathy in the grief of those many families whose best and dearest have been slain or wounded; there comes to be visible once more that—that End and Aim—for which in the last resort every man would die. We see the noble self-devotion with which thousands of men have offered themselves to their country's service, and the least generous among us cannot but have stirrings of admiration for those men; the most callous cannot but feel their own love pulsing more quickly and their own sympathy growing larger and deeper.

I heard a sermon the other day, in which the preacher took occasion to argue from the existence of these higher feelings in man (of which, in a time like this, we are given so blessed, because so real and spontaneous an assurance), the existence in God also of something of which these feelings in man are, in truth, a very counterpart. In fact, he deduced from them the Love of God.

Now the knowledge of God's love is a grand and blessed thing; the conviction of it in the heart is a powerful conviction, able to work wonders in the sorrowing and despairing soul. And why? Because Love is the one thing which never fails or yields, or gives up its object; the one fire which never ceases to burn; the one Invincible Might which proceeds for ever and for ever towards its end!

War! The struggle of nations for victory! The hideous slaughter of man by his brother man! What is it, after all, in the sight of God? Human history is one long record of terrible carnage. Natural history is the same. Have not entire species of animals disappeared from off the face of the earth through the savage slaughter of a stronger race? What is that in the sight of God—God who ordains the famine and the flood, and the burning mountain which overwhelms the inhabitants of a city before they have time to flee? God does not shrink from slaughter. What is that in His sight? What is that to Him who is Love; that Invincible Might which proceeds for ever and for ever towards its perfect end?

The terror of these things is for man alone. They are but steps in the Onward March of God's great purposes. A hundred years hence the marks of blood will all be wiped away, as to-day the bloody marks of a hundred years ago are gone. But one step of God's great progress will be made.

There are those who say that we are waging an unjust war; who think, as the Boers think, that they are in the right. There are those who wrangle as to who is responsible for having dragged the country into war; they say it is the doing of capitalists for their own selfish ends. There are those who condemn all war, and think they know a better way. There are those who think of the war only as it affects personal interests—makes for the prestige or otherwise of their country—raises or lowers themselves and their nation in the general estimation of the world.

All these are small and narrow views. Above and beyond the aims of individual men or individual nations, there is the great Purpose of God. God looks down from heaven and He sees us fighting; He looks down and He sees the Boers fighting too. They are no less His children than ourselves. He will not favour them any more than He favours us; He will not favour us any more than He favours them. But it is His purposes which in the end will be victorious—the Purposes of Love! the Purposes of Justice! the Purposes of Freedom! the gradual uprising of a finer race of men! The Purposes of God march onward no less through war than through peace; no less through famine, flood and pestilence than through plenty and prosperity.

It is for us—individuals who collectively constitute the nation—it is for us to make those purposes of Love our purposes; to have a noble end in what we do; to sink all mean desires; to put in the background merely personal aims; to rise into some high conception of our duties, as a nation upon whom one of God's evident purposes has been to throw a vast responsibility throughout the world. So doing, we may feel a perfect confidence of being justified in God's sight; and we may rest in the knowledge of that great Love which holds the warring nations in the hollow of its hand. Even in the midst of discouragement, in the hour of bafflement; in the face of heavy loss; in the day of danger; we may still have no fear; for the Purposes of God are then our purposes; and the Purposes of God march on for ever towards their perfect end.

Dublin. G. HAMILTON VANCE.

[But can we in this war be sure that the Purposes of God are our purposes, and that we, as a nation, are using righteous means for a noble end? Doubtless the Divine Purposes of Love, Justice, and Freedom will march onward, through war as through peace, even though those great causes may be thrown back for a generation by selfish policy and unrighteous war. Iniquity often triumphs for a time. We have to see to it that at all costs we hold fast to righteousness, which alone exalteth a nation, and which alone will preserve the British Empire from a disastrous and humiliating fall.—ED. WHETHER any particular day shall bring to you more of happiness or of suffering is largely beyond your power to determine. Whether each day of your life shall give happiness or suffering rests with yourself.—G. S. Merriam.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Give us this day our daily bread."

THESE words begin a second part of the Lord's Prayer. At least, I always think of it so. The first four clauses seem to belong so closely together, simply expressing more and more fully in earnest prayer what we feel towards God as our Father, longing for a true reverence for His holiness, the good order of righteousness in the world, as His Kingdom, and the doing of His will in our hearts and lives. And then come some further thoughts of the chief needs of our life here on earth, and how we must feel about them when we remember that God is our Father.

The first of these is the thought of daily bread. We know that we must have bread, if we are to live and do our work in the world. And what we remember in this prayer is that it is our Father who gives us daily bread, with all the other good gifts of life. Not that He gives it without our taking any trouble. You know that men have to work, to plough the fields, to sow corn and gather in the harvest, so that we may have bread, and they have to take care of the gardens, and the orchards, and so by hard work gather in all kinds of fruit and vegetables, and other things good to eat, which all go to make up what we may call our "daily bread." But it is God who makes the the earth so fruitful, and makes one tiny seed grow up and produce sixty or a hundred others, and makes the blossom on the fruit tree turn into beautiful apples or other good fruit. It is He who gives the fresh air and the rain and sunshine, which are all needed for our daily bread, and He gives us strength and wisdom to make the best use of His other good gifts in the earth. And it is far better so. Our life is happier and nobler because we have to work for our daily bread; but all the time we must thankfully remember that it is God who gives it us, in His best way. When, therefore, we pray, "Give us this day our daily bread," this is part of the thought that may go with it: "Let us never forget that it is Thou, our Father, who givest us our daily bread, who makest the earth fruitful, and givest us power to work and gather in the harvest. Let us always be thankful and diligent to do our part faithfully and well, taking our whole life with reverence and earnestness, according to Thy will." Such thoughts and others which grow out of them, and seem to take a good many words to express, come in a moment into our hearts as we repeat the words we know so well, and become part of the true meaning of the prayer.

But if any of you, children, are troubled by the thought that you cannot do any part of that good work, by which daily bread is earned, remember that your time for work will come, and that even now you can at least show that you are thankful for what you receive, by being good children, by being careful in the use of all the good gifts of your life, wasting and spoiling nothing, and by being unselfish and generous in sharing with others. That all belongs to the true receiving of daily bread from our Father, and you should remember it when you repeat those words of the prayer.

Children are often careless and waste a great deal—and so do a good many grown-up people, who ought to know better. But if you cannot yet work for your daily bread, you can be getting ready for work; and the more you learn about plants and flowers and fruit, and about different countries of the world and what grows there, and the different kinds of work men do, the more you will feel how wonderful and beautiful the order of the world is, and how much there is to be thankful for. And then you will see how by being careful of the good gifts of the earth, and by being wise and generous in sharing them among the people, all are able to have daily bread. That is one great part of the prayer to-day, to try to arrange that everyone may have a chance to do honest work and earn what they need of daily bread. Some of you, perhaps, have read about the Corn-laws in England. Sixty years ago if corn was brought to England from other countries money had to be paid for leave to bring it in, as well as the natural price of the corn, and that made bread very dear, so that many of the poor people could not buy enough, and were starving and in a very miserable condition. Then Cobden and Bright, and other wise and brave men, worked to have the law done away with, and in 1846 they succeeded, so that bread became much cheaper, and the whole country was the better for it. In that great work they were praying for all the people, "Give us this day our daily bread."

If you are learning to be careful and generous in the use of what you have, you are helping to make the prayer more real. For if you are thankful to God for your daily bread, you must want others to have some too. If you are able to save up a little money, which you might have wasted on things you do not really want, or on some greedy pleasure, and then are able to do some act of kindness with it, to help some poor children who really have not enough to eat, or to send some nice present to the children's hospital, you will be using "daily bread" as our Father means that we should use it, and there will be a new and happier meaning in the prayer for you.

Long ago, in the islands of the West Indies, slaves were kept to work on the sugar plantations, from which sugar was sent to this country. It was an evil thing to make slaves of men, and they were cruelly treated. Then a great movement arose to set the slaves free, and many children in English homes gave up using sugar, and saved the money that would have been spent on it to help the movement to free the slaves. At last that was done, and by their little acts of self-denial the children had been helping, and it had been with them really a prayer for daily bread, for freedom is a part of daily bread to all true men, and they had felt they could not enjoy what was got by cruelty to the slaves.

And that leads me to the last thing I want to say. When we pray for daily bread, remembering that it is our Father's gift, we know that it must be honestly got, —not by stealing, but by honest work, or by thankfully receiving what is freely given. That honesty is really part of our daily bread. We do not live "by bread alone," in the sense of things we eat; everything that makes us strong is the real bread of our life, which God gives—all that feeds our mind with knowledge and joy in beautiful things, and with truth and honour, so that there is a yet wider meaning in the prayer, and again we are reminded of the great word, Righteousness first. Here, as in the rest of the prayer, the whole meaning is in the thought that we must live as children of our Father in heaven.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. HENRY HILL.

THE death of the Rev. Henry Hill, which occurred on Monday, Feb. 5, after a brief illness, has called forth many expressions of regret and sympathy at Banbury, where he had been minister of Christ Church Chapel for the past eight years. A native of Rochdale, where he was born, March 22, 1835, Mr. Hill was educated for the ministry at the Home Missionary Board in Manchester, under Dr. Beard and the Revs. William Gaskell and Brooke Herford. Entering in 1861, he went, on the completion of his course, to Underbank Chapel, Stannington, near Sheffield, where he ministered from 1864 to 1872. His subsequent charges were at Middlesbrough, Rawtenstall, and Stroud, until in 1892 he settled at Banbury, where by quiet faithfulness he won for himself a position of deserved respect in the town. In an obituary notice in the Banbury Observer, it is said of him:—"The deceased was a gentleman of most unassuming manners, gentle, tolerant in his views, and deeply earnest in the discharge of whatever he undertook. To know him was to hold him in high esteem, alike for his genial temperament, as for his old-world courteous bearing." Mr. Hill had occupied his pulpit on the last Sunday in January, but subsequently suffered from an attack of bronchitis, from which he had not strength to rally, and he passed peacefully away.

GIORDANO BRUNO.

ON the morning of Feb. 17, 1600, on the Campo dei Fiori at Rome, GIORDANO BRUNO was burnt as a heretic. A victim of the Inquisition, a martyr to the fearless service of truth and freedom of thought, after seven years of rigorous imprisonment, he faced death unflinchingly, and passed through the flames into a larger liberty.

An Italian, born at Nola, in the kingdom of Naples, BRUNO was early devoted to the service of the Church as a Dominican monk, but his eager mind and independent spirit did not suffer him long to remain within the strict lines of orthodox belief. In 1542 COPERNICUS had died, and in 1546 MARTIN LUTHER. Not long after, perhaps in 1548, BRUNO was born, and became in time an ardent advocate of the theories of the former, so subversive of the orthodox views of creation, while the principles of spiritual freedom and fearless study of the Bible he carried out even more consistently than the great reformer.

As a young man, already a priest, he devoted himself to the study of ancient philosophy and natural science, but was something also of a poet and satirist. Having fallen under serious suspicion of heresy, he fled from his monastery to Rome, and passed thence through various Italian cities, until he came to Geneva, where he was welcomed by a colony of Italian Protestants. He does not, however, seem to have definitely joined any Protestant communion, and was strongly opposed to the Calvinistic scheme of theology. Geneva was not destined to be his resting place. He lectured for some time in the University of Toulouse on ARISTOTLE, and in 1580 was in Paris, where he refused a professorship at the Sorbonne. Thence he crossed over to England, and came to Oxford, lecturing there on the Copernican system; but having aroused orthodox opposition he returned to London, and there spent two years, which are spoken of as the most productive and happiest of his life. He was not yet forty and was possessed of brilliant gifts; he was received at ELIZABETH'S Court, and enjoyed the friendship of Sir PHILIP SIDNEY. In London he wrote his "Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast," a satirical allegory, and other of his chief metaphysical works; but there also his philosophical and other heresies would not suffer him to remain in peace; his advocacy of the Copernican system and denunciation of ARISTOTLE, together with his satiric vein were the constant cause of trouble. In 1585 he again passed through Paris, and for a short time settled at Wittenberg as Professor in the University, lecturing on philosophy and mathematics. But either his own restless spirit or the necessity of his circumstances drove him on, and he is found at Prague, at Helmstedt, and at Frankfort-on-the-Main, where he was superintending the printing of his Latin poems and other publications. Finally, in 1591, he ventured back to Italy, and at Venice in the following year was seized by the officers of the Inquisition, and early in 1593 was handed over to the authorities at Rome. The martyrdom of his long imprisonment followed, and the final tragedy of his burning, just three hundred years ago.

In 1889 a monument to BRUNO'S memory was dedicated on the Campo dei Fiori by the people of a liberated and united Italy, while the successor of the Pope, who had sat there enthroned by the side of the Grand Inquisitor to witness the burning of the heretic, was obliged to suffer it with helpless indignation. The monument is decorated with medallion portraits of great reformers and heretics such as WICLIF, HUSS, SERVETUS and CAMPANELLO, and with bas-reliefs showing scenes in BRUNO'S life, his lecturing at Oxford, his examination by the Inquisition and his martyrdom.

In the history of thought BRUNO is spoken of as a forerunner of DESCARTES, and he has attracted the attention of the great idealist philosophers of more recent times. HEGEL is said to have spoken of him as a comet, taking a course diverging far from the plane of the received philosophy of his day, which might perhaps return again after three hundred years. His speculations seem to rank him as a Pantheist, but with a clear apprehension of the reality of personal spiritual life. To the Inquisitors he declared that he could not find the ecclesiastical doctrine of the Trinity in the New Testament, but he recognised the divine nature in JESUS, to whom the moral law of the Gospel bore the strongest witness. The Apostles, he said, he had praised, for they had converted the world by teaching and good example, and not as the Church attempted it, by compulsion and persecution.

Of the writings of BRUNO we do not pretend to have made any study, fascinating as they undoubtedly would be to the student of religious philosophy. It is not on account of any special views he held that we commemorate him here, but as a fearless martyr to truth, whose life, devoted to the eager pursuit of knowledge, and whose tragic death stand out as witnesses against the cruel tyranny of a dogmatic Church. In BRUNO we have a striking exemplification of the principles by which we must still be led into the truth—freedom of investigation, determined to know the facts of life, and in Christian discipleship trust in the inward witness to the commanding nature of moral excellence. It is easier for us than it was for BRUNO to be loyal to the truth; we have not to face the terrible risk of what finally befell him; but we may be roused by the memory of his last courageous witness to a renewed dedication of ourselves to that high service, with a yet profounder conviction that by the way of truth GOD is leading us, and that in the freedom of the spirit the transcendent grace of the Christian life will most surely manifest its power in the world.

SIMILES.

NOT all at once this miracle was done;
Softly the pure flakes fell—yet one by one!
Till every leafless bough, wall, hedge, and roof
Was shrouded in a robe of seamless woof:
And rising from oblivious sleep we saw
The snow-clad city, white without a flaw,
Which yesterday, touched with a murkier air,
Looked less serenely fair.

Not all at once the spring her largess gives,
Enriching the forlornest heart that lives;
But gradual as the dawn her tender green
On wind-swept slopes and budding hedge is seen;
Till, lured by sun and rainfall, leaves unfold,
The daffodil displays her cup of gold;
And beauty, spreading round us unaware,
Leaves nothing black or bare.

As slowly—yet as surely, we would pray!
Our spirits grow diviner day by day;
Not left, though each experience seems more hard,
The prey of things that sully and retard:
But strengthened by the hourly tests which prove
The soul, illumined with Eternal Love,
Drawn upward like the blossom in the sod
To life—to God!

STEVENSON'S LETTERS.

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.

"Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say unto you, rejoice."—Phil. iv. 4.

I WANT to speak this morning of the religious significance of the recently published letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Their publication impresses me as an event which will have far-reaching and important consequences in English literature and therefore in English life. Many of us have learnt to love and admire Stevenson through his works: these letters will arouse in every one who cared for him before a still deeper affection and gratitude.

Literature is self-expression through language, whether it be the self-expression of the philosopher, the poet, the historian, or the novelist. It is a witness of the human spirit to what it loves and lives by. There is some indication of a man's religion in all great literature. "In literature," says Dr. Martineau, "you can measure the reality of religion. What proportion of the beliefs contained in the Thirty-nine Articles, or in the symbolical books of any Church, comes naturally out in the poetry, the fiction, the philosophy of our time? The men of letters are so silent of them as to indicate that a few only of these ideas, though infinitely solemn, appear in their picture of the universe. And so a 'religious literature' is created. The fact is painfully significant. We talk as if this was written for the religious public—and what other public is there in this God-created world? Where are the people from whose nature He has omitted the springs of wonder, love and reverence, and quite hidden the beauty and the mystery of life? The natural alliance of every unconstrained literature is with the real religion of its time, to whose inner admiration its appeal is made."

These letters of Stevenson are not technically "Religious Literature," but they have much not only ethical, but religious, significance; they have that in them which can cheer and ennoble human life. And first they bring us nearer to a man who, as Mr. Colvin says, had "a peculiar and personal power to charm, to attach, and to inspirit." He is the most loveable of all our writers since Charles Lamb. I will not try to analyse at any length that loveableness and charm. Partly it was due to his spontaneous child-like nature. "There was never a time in his life," says Mr. Colvin, "when Stevenson had to say with Augustine, 'Behold my childhood is dead, but I am alive.'" It is one of the saddest things a man can say; but for those who are truly alive, who live near the heart of things, who are loving and gentle and trusting in good, their childhood is never dead. Assuredly the heart of a child was always in Stevenson. But I shall not dwell further on the inexplicable charm of his personality—that can be felt only by contact with his books or letters. It is by far the most important part of his influence, but I wish now to speak of some of his teachings and the thoughts suggested by them.

"His writings are full," says Mr. Colvin, "of the essential poetry and significance of things as they reveal themselves to true masters only—they are instinct at once with the morality and the romance which lie deep together at the soul of nature and experience." That expresses part of what those who love his writings feel. Romance and morality are always tending to separate. We are inclined to think of morality as rather dull, and of romance as rather immoral. No one realises what true goodness means who thinks of it as dull, tepid, valetudinarian, without thrill and brightness and daring. Stevenson makes us feel that the romance of virtue is the most exciting thing in the world. None of our writers have treated conduct so romantically since Spenser wrote his "Fairie Queen." That is the classical example of the romantic treatment of conduct. Stevenson has written no great book upon the subject; but his life and writings are full of the same spirit. He had the spirit of adventure always. He treated sickness as Columbus treated storms. He was deeply convinced that there could be no permanent beauty without goodness. "Do you remember," he writes, "once consulting me in Paris whether you had not better sacrifice honesty to art, and how after much confabulation we agreed your art would suffer if you did? We decided better than we knew. In this strange welter where we live, all hangs together by a million filaments; and to do reasonably well by others is the first pre-requisite of art. Art is a virtue; and if I were the man I should be, my art would rise in the proportion of my life. If you were privileged to give some happiness to your parents, I know your art will gain by it." That is the most important testimony since Ruskin to the fundamental truth that goodness is the basis of art as of all life, and it comes from a man who is recognised even by those who put art outside morality as one of the greatest modern artists in literature.

The power to create beauty, or to enjoy beauty, depends on righteousness. It is not merely by a certain school of artists that this truth is denied. That is bad enough, for it leads to the production of dangerous and corrupt creations which may, through the influence of fashion, persuade us for a time that they are beautiful. But the truth is not fully recognised by ourselves. We are inclined to look on goodness as a dull, disagreeable necessity: enjoyment is one thing; righteousness is another. Mr. Wicksteed, in his Essex Hall lecture, has described the end of religion as enjoying God. The end of morality in Stevenson's thought is enjoying righteousness. Morality is not at war with beauty and pleasure: it is the soul of them. And what does he mean by morality and religion? "I wonder," he writes to his mother, "if you or my father ever thought of the obscurities that lie upon human duty from the negative form in which the Ten Commandments are stated, or of how Christ was so continually substituting affirmations. 'Thou shalt not' is but an example. 'Thou shalt' is the law of God. A kind of black angry look goes with that statement of the law of negatives. To love one's neighbour as oneself is certainly much harder, but states life so much more actively, gladly, and kindly that you can begin to see some pleasure in it; and till you can see pleasure in these hard choices and bitter necessities, where is there any good news to men? It is much more important to do right than not to do wrong, and the faithful design to do right is accepted by God: that seems to me to be the Gospel, and that was how Christ delivered us from the Law. After people are told that, surely they might have more encouraging sermons. Faith is not to believe the Bible, but to believe in God. The whole necessary morality is kindness, and it should spring of itself from the fundamental doctrine Faith. If you are sure that in the long run God means kindness by you, you should be happy, and if happy surely you should be kind. I beg your pardon for this long discourse: it is not all right of course, but I am sure that there is something in it." We can all feel that there is something in it. Morality is more than kindness, and religion is more than trust in God; but with Stevenson's main point that morality is positive rather than negative we shall all agree. It is not merely abstaining from breaking the Commandments: it is a strong, daring, energetic devotion to good.

To be happy and to be kind, those were the duties on which Stevenson was continually insisting. And when we remember his fifteen years of ill-health, we can understand that he may have found them the hardest of the virtues. Cut off from the activities he loved, separated often from his friends, face to face continually with death, hindered in his work by pain and weakness, worried by want of money, he might have been excused for taking a dismal view of life. He is on the contrary amongst all our modern writers most full of joy and hope and courage. Mr. Wm. Archer, in a review of his books, in strange ignorance of the writer's circumstances, had called him an æsthetic athlete, and warned him that "a rheumatic fever would try his philosophy, and that his gospel would not do for those who are shut out from the exercise of any manly virtue save renunciation." Stevenson writes to him in reply, "I have been on the whole much interested and sometimes amused. Are you aware that the praiser of this 'brave gymnasium' has not seen a canoe or taken a long walk since 1879, and that he is rarely out of the house nowadays, and carries his arm in a sling?" And, in another letter to the same correspondent, he says, "It is then as I supposed: you are of the school of the generous and not the sullen pessimists, and I can feel with you. I used myself to rage when I saw sick folk going by in Bath-chairs: since I have been sick myself, and always when I was sick myself, I found life even in its rough places to have a property of easiness. That which we suffer ourselves has no longer the same air of monstrous injustice and wanton cruelty that suffering wears when we see it in the case of others. I should bear false witness if I did not declare life happy. And your wonderful statement that happiness tends to die out and misery to continue is diagnostic of the happy man raging over the misery of others: it could never have been written by the man who had tried what unhappiness was like." That is wonderfully subtle criticism, and at the same time the self-revelation of a faith and courage which it does us good to feel. What a contrast to the complainings and the fears with which the lives of healthy prosperous people are so often full! It is profoundly true that those who find fault with life and are frightened, are not those for the most part who have faced the realities of sorrow and pain. It is the crumpled rose leaves, not the thorns, which make men melancholy.

When Stevenson utters a note of complaint, it is in the following fashion:—"I have so many things to make life sweet to me, it seems a pity I cannot have that other one thing—health. But though you will be angry to hear it, I believe, for myself at least, what is is best." This is not theological language, but it means a deep faith in God. Religion meant to him rejoicing in the Lord, and in life, and in the world which He had made.

"I do not call that by the name of religion which fills a man with bile." "I will think more of his prayers when I see in him a spirit of praise." And then, writing in a lighter vein to his father, who was suffering from low spirits:—"I fear I have been a little in the dumps, which, as you know, sir, is a very great sin. I must try to be more cheerful; but my cough is so severe that I have sometimes most exhausting nights and very peevish wakenings. However, this shall be remedied, and last night I was distinctly better than the night before. There is, my dear Mr. Stevenson, no more abominable sin than this gloom, this plaguey peevishness. Why, what matters it if we be a little uncomfortable, that is no reason for mangling our unhappy wives." "To fret and fume is undignified, suicidally foolish, and theologically unpardonable; to preserve a proper equanimity is not merely the first part of submission to God, but the chief of present kindnesses to those about us." This is not Stoic indifference or endurance; it is bearing trials cheerfully and bravely in order to be kind. Happiness was to him a duty, because it made life easier and more beautiful to others. It is no light, careless joy of which he is thinking. He speaks in one of his letters of the "great double danger of taking life too easily and taking it too hard; how difficult it is to balance that!" Yes; there is that double danger. On the one hand, the fat, lazy, selfish contentment which ignores everything but its own pleasures, and hides away from any thought of pain or death. And, on the other hand, the worried, fretful existence of which we nearly all of us know something, which makes life a burden, not only to ourselves, but to those we love.

In the hurry and bustle of modern life that is a great danger for us all. So far as it is mere nervous strain it demands more physical exercise and care of our health. There is no merit in ignoring our nerves until they become a burden to others as well as ourselves. But for the most part worry and fretfulness and gloom are not merely physical. We have thought too little of the things that belong unto our peace. Just as in the crowded city streets at night with the flaring lamps and windows we hardly ever lift our eyes upwards to the stars, so in this crowded modern life of work and pleasure we think little of the eternal peace and power above. Our spirits weary of the triviality and excitement, and yet find no refreshment. We are driven about by the winds like the spirits in Dante's hell and find no rest. To live in the world and yet above it, to be in contact with great realities, to be conscious of the grandeur and beauty of the universe and human nature, to have communion with the Eternal who manifests Himself through all things, this is to rejoice in the Lord. Such rejoicing gives us power to walk humbly, happily, trustfully amidst the noise and confusion and excitement, to do our day's work brightly and to be kind. He who has such faith in God's love, such quiet happiness and the power which such happiness gives of being kind, is not far from the Kingdom of Heaven.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR,—I regret that I cannot accept Mr. Robinson's temperate letter as a complete reply to his quotation from mine, and must claim a little of your space for this rejoinder.

Mr. Robinson claims that the franchise law of July was a reasonable concession which should have prevented war; but in the same Blue Book it is described by a competent authority "as so beset and hedged round with irritating and impossible conditions" as to render it of no practical value as a measure of enfranchisement (C. 9518, p. 54; see also pp. 51–52). Then reference is made to the offer of the Transvaal Government, dated Aug. 19, "with certain conditions." But these conditions are the reverse of trivial, as they involve the surrender of the slight vestige of British authority reserved by the Conventions (C. 9521, pp. 58–59), and the offer undoubtedly, clogged with these conditions, was rejected by Mr. Chamberlain in his despatch of Aug. 28, but not discourteously.

Mr. Kruger's admirers find it convenient to ignore Mr. Chamberlain's despatch of Sept. 8 (C. 9521, pp. 64–65), in which he unequivocally accepts the terms contained in the despatch of Aug. 19, minus the conditions. This proposal was refused by Mr. Reitz in his despatch of Sept. 16 (C. 9530, p. 12), and he explained that the acceptance of the conditions was the only consideration for the offer of a five-years' franchise. Considering the manner in which Mr. Kruger replied to an appeal of the Outlanders in December, 1895 (shortly before the Raid), when he said, "Their rights! Yes, they'll get them over my dead body," and his persistent hostility to them and to this country ever since the date of the Conventions, it is not an uncharitable conclusion that he never had any bonâ fide intention of granting "reasonable concessions" to the Outlanders.

Can Mr. Robinson be serious in denying the "religious" name to our Colonists of the Episcopalian, Wesleyan and Congregational denominations because they form a judgment on South African politics at variance with his own? or that "they preach hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness towards their fellow-creatures"? I quote from a memorial addressed by the Natal Congregationalists to their co-religionists in England:—"While, as Christians, deeply deploring the war, we express our deliberate conviction that, humanly speaking, the conflict was inevitable. The war had long been premeditated and prepared for by the Boers, with a view to military and political dominion over the whole of South Africa; and the plea of fighting for independence was but a blind to hide the real aim of the enormous military preparations of the Republics, which commenced years before the Jameson Raid.'

Where is the malice and uncharitableness in this? It is the cool deliberate conviction of men who are acquainted with all the ins and outs of the question, and, moreover, with the additional advantage of being "on the spot." I am reminded of an incident which occurred once when travelling in Yorkshire. A dispute arose between a Nonconformist minister and a Yorkshire farmer as to where the Aire joined the Ouse; the farmer saying the junction was below Selby, but the minister asserting that "long before the Ouse reaches Selby it has received the waters of the Aire." "Nah! Nah!" replied the farmer, "t'Aire joins t'Ouse at Faxfleet by Armin thair. Ah've bin on th' sphawt." After much discussion the farmer at last took out his purse, saying, "Coom neaw Ah'll tell thi whawt. Ah'll bet thi a sovran on't, and whawts moor Ah'll staak t'braas." The minister would not bet, and recommended reference to a map. On reaching home I had the curiosity to look at the map, and found that the man who had been "on the spot" was right.

[That all those who are "on the spot" do not share the views of the Natal ministers may be seen from the letter of the Rev. J. T. Lloyd, of Johannesburg, in the British Weekly of Feb. 8, who wrote on Dec. 13 as the only Presbyterian minister remaining in the South African Republic. He confesses that he represents the minority, so far as British subjects are concerned, but after sixteen years' residence in South Africa strongly urges those who desire to know the truth of the matter to attend to the witness of Mr. Selous and Professor Bryce.—ED. "BACK TO JESUS."

SIR,—May an unlearned man throw in a word on this interesting discussion as to the relative value of Personality and Teaching. I entirely agree that the former, when it can be directly got at, is a supreme power. We meet, in the flesh, men and women who affect us strongly, quite apart from what they may say, and we fall under the spell of their magnetism. But away from their objective presence, our realisation of their personality is subjective and depends largely on ourselves. Even the supreme Personality of God, without the conviction and realisation of which religion is impossible, can only be subjectively conceived. We take all the highest elements of personality we know of in humanity, and we say "These, and far more, are derived from God and must exist in Him"; so out of these we build up our Idea of God. (I speak as an unlearned man, and like unto the man in the street. Possibly learned men may find flaws in this way of putting it.) But then we believe we are helped in this realisation by the actual contact with and presence of God in our souls. The Person is present with us, invisibly it is true, but truly.

Is this the case as regards historical human personalities? We take all the possible materials we can find in the New Testament, and out of them we construct or from them we receive impressions of the Person of Jesus. But cold print cannot convey personality. Greek manuscripts are devoid of the magnetism which draws us to very inferior living beings whom we meet in the flesh. After all, the most we can do is, out of very inadequate and often inconsistent materials, to build up a subjective ideal portrait of Jesus, the power of which lies really in our own possibilities of sympathy and insight. It is the sigh and aspiration of our own struggling souls embodied in the outlines suggested by the Gospels. Unless, as our orthodox brethren do, we believe that Jesus himself, personally, is present in us, as God is, which is of course conceding his deity, we have nothing but these two elements, tradition and idealism, to go on. Accordingly, we shall see in Jesus what we most want to see, and no two will see quite alike.

Now as to teachings. Mr. Lloyd Thomas quotes from three writers whom he supposes will have weight with Mr. Armstrong. One of these is personally known to both, and what he writes will be affected by that personal knowledge. But are the other two similarly known to Mr. Thomas? He and others are greatly impressed and guided by Professor Harnack. Have they first of all gone to make his personal acquaintance, or have they even studied any biographical sketches of the man, before they let his teachings carry weight? What do we know as to the personality of Thomas à Kempis whose "Imitation" affects many souls so deeply? I presume that Plato has exercised a mighty influence in the world. Was it his personality or his teachings which gave power?

We have just lost a great personality from our midst. Men of widely differing minds testify to it and give their impressions of it. We have portraits, busts, a statue, and biographical notices, whereby to realise what manner of man he was. But fifty years hence, when men read his religious and philosophical works, will they first study these biographies and portraits before accepting his precious bequests of thought, or will it be the study of his teachings which will make some of them turn back and say, "We would know what manner of man this was, whose mind so impresses us, even in cold print?"

So it seems to me that while present actual personality is greater than teachings, past and historical personality becomes ideal and subjective, while the teachings shine out over the ages, undimmed by the lapse of time.

H. W. Hawkes.

Sir,—Mr. Lloyd Thomas has quoted some eminent authorities in his article on "The Importance of Personality." To Drummond, Réville, Harnack, I would add another—Martineau.

The Prospective Review for February, 1846, contains a review by Dr. Martineau of Theodore Parker's "Discourse of Religion," in which the fallacy that Christianity would be as true if Herod or Cataline had taught it, is exposed. Without quoting the whole passage, this seems especially pertinent to the subject of Mr. Thomas's article:—

"Prove what you will against his life," might it then be said, "his attested doctrine remains." "Prove what you will against his doctrine," would we rather say, "his divine life remains; and with more 'truth' in it, than in any proposition in the Bible or out of it." No revelation of duty is possible, except through the Conscience; and Conscience cannot be effectually reached but by the presence of a holier life and a higher spirit. From the spectacle of devoted excellence and saintly beauty of mind, as from nothing else, flashes down upon us the awful and redeeming sense of new obligation: the thing seen in the concrete becomes conviction in the abstract: and a religion lived passes into a religion believed. And so we regard it as a rule in matters of devout faith, that it is reverence for persons which gives perception of truth in ideas. ("Essays, Reviews and Addresses," vol. I., p. 183).

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

It is strange to be writing a letter on the Eastern Counties almost within sight of the Straits of Messina and the snowy mountains of Sicily, where stands Etna, veiled with its own pillar of cloud. Though leaving England farther behind with every beat of the screws, and though occupied with thoughts of the new enterprise that lies "on the under side," yet my mind continues to dwell much on the condition of our churches in East Anglia.

The general impression is that the East is dead. I think I remember seeing it described as a place of tombs. My impression is different. There are signs, it is true, of beauty and comfort—faded grandeur—that had their rise in a former prosperity, now gone. Mediæval churches in abundance that were built by wealthy merchants, thank-offerings to God for successful ventures; domestic buildings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, whose carvings and fittings are evidence of refinement and luxury; Nonconformist places of worship, like our own at Ipswich, whose extent points to once flourishing congregations; towns, like Framlingham, once important for industry, now decaying or stagnant.

But it is as when a devastating fire passes over a land, much disappears to make one sad. A few relics of former glories remain. And among the ashes there may be seen the tiny blades of tender grass, the first promise of ever-renewing life. Mother Nature is not checked. She never despairs. She quickly begins to clothe the waste places. Let the husbandman but put his hand to the plough, let the ground be cleared and sown, and the soil will be found to repay him for his labour.

So I believe it is in East Anglia to-day. There is abundant hope for patient work. Visit Framlingham, visit Bury St. Edmunds, visit the ancient and more picturesque parts of Norwich and Ipswich, and one feels in the midst of a bygone age. These are the remains of a glory that is departed. But departed whither? Visit other parts of Norwich, Ipswich, Lowestoft, Lynn, Braintree, &c., unpicturesque, modern, and one's impression is very different. They are places of busy industry and increasing prosperity. We see a new vegetation breaking forth in new places. Talk about tombs! Rather think of good Suffolk beef, flavoured with Norwich mustard! It is a significant fact that almost every town in the Eastern Counties is increasing in population, and that some, like Norwich and Ipswich, are going up by leaps and bounds. If I have the happiness to visit these two towns ten years hence, I feel confident I shall with difficulty recognise them. Many old features will have been ruthlessly swept away by the tide of present-day needs; the newer population will have followed the centrifugal tendency so marked to-day; the former centres of religious activity, which must follow the resident population, will have changed enormously.

And where do we come in with our Unitarian churches? We have shared the decay which was incidental to the changes of the century, and which fell upon all, to a great extent. But where we have shown our readiness to labour, and to push our work beyond the old bounds, there has been success, or a measure of it, to justify hope.

Take Framlingham. Ten or twelve years ago it seemed dead to us. The former adherents of the old chapel had emigrated and become supporters of places in London or Ipswich or elsewhere. But Mr. Amey pushed out, preached in the villages, tried this and that, and finally crowned his efforts in Bedfield. Now, a renewed effort at the original chapel has borne fruit. Even in Framlingham, which one would have pronounced the most utterly hopeless place for us in the East, the result of two years' regular services, chiefly by outside preachers assisting Mr. Amey to bear the burden of the two churches, has been the building up of a congregation of thirty or forty. Here, it seems to me, the Central Postal Mission ought to try to give Mr. Amey additional settled assistance in some form, and so follow up assiduously what has been already achieved. Plainly, the responsibility and burden of two services at Framlingham, and two services at Bedfield, six miles away, is excessive.

I should like to see someone settled at Yarmouth, who would be enterprising enough to make a similar attempt there, and try services, not only in the chapel down the dingy disreputable Middle Gate, but also in the South Town or other suburbs. It is, unfortunately, at present without a minister*; but from personal experience during last summer, the best time for visitors, but the worst for local inhabitants, I believe that an energetic, tactful, and patient leader could build up a congregation. There are floating elements ready to be drawn in.

It is interesting to remember Filby in connection with Yarmouth. Filby is a chapel absolutely without a congregation, much dilapidated and neglected, but preached in occasionally during the year by the minister of Yarmouth. It dates from 1706, and is a little Nonconformist Westminster Abbey in its way. Its floors are paved with tombstones, recording the virtues and generosity of eighteenth-century worthies, among whom are the ancestors of the late Marchioness of Salisbury. Even Filby should be tried. There seems to be a considerable, if scattered, population around; and unexpected success might await persistent work.

At Braintree Mr. Fuller appears to be reaping the reward of more concentrated effort. It was painful for the Halstead folk to be deprived of their minister when his lectures, especially at the last, drew large audiences. But the event has justified the move. And we may now expect that in time Braintree will be strong enough to weather the worst gale. It has sustained two severe blows recently in the loss of Mr. Parish, its secretary, and of Mr. Sydney Courtauld, the full extent of whose generosity and interest no one knew. Last year was opened a new iron schoolroom, the value of which was appreciated at the annual meeting of the Eastern Union.

* Since Mr. Jellie sailed, the Rev. C. D. Badland has undertaken the ministry at Yarmouth.

Halstead, without a church and without a minister, seemed pretty hopeless when Mr. Fuller left. But here again we have seen the good results of hopeful effort. For the last six months services have been held in the factory schoolroom, fortnightly, chiefly by lay-preachers, and a steady congregation of from thirty to forty has thereby been kept together. It is now for three months in charge of Mr. Bain.

It is impossible to speak of every place, and a word must be said of Norwich and Ipswich. It is most untoward to have the two most important churches in the district vacant at the same time, but in neither place is the prospect without hope and even encouragement. Norwich is only waiting till July to begin work in earnest under the Rev. Alfred Hall, who is completing his studies in Germany; and meanwhile, it is spending its £600 in reseating the gallery, redecorating the interior, fitting electric light, adding to the organ, and purchasing the Berwick Hymnal. A new start indeed, and we trust a happy and prosperous one, in this undoubtedly fine field of work, on whose welfare that of the whole Eastern Counties depends so much.

Ipswich, too, has done well in raising half of the large sum it asked for (£1,500) to worthily celebrate its coming Bi-centenary. When we consider the number and nature of the appeals now before the public, it is a matter of congratulation to have raised £750. The congregation, encouraged by this response, has decided to transfer services at once to the schoolroom in order to commence operations upon the old building. It is earnestly to be hoped that the prospect of improvement thus opened out will persuade some energetic spirit to take up the work and carry it on without much of a break, in spite of the inconveniences incidental to such a dislocation of affairs. And when, now that the Christmas holidays are over, the Bi-centenary Committee again appeals to the public, may our people be sufficiently interested in the renovation of this fine old monument of seventeenth-century nonconformity as to quickly subscribe the needed sum. The Society for the Preservation of Ancient Buildings has commended the work, especially seeing that the intention is to keep everything as far as possible in its original style.

No, no! the East is not dead. Nor is it even sleeping! This may be a day of small things—but that consideration is beside the mark. The point is that there is living work being done. New hearts and minds are being touched from week to week. The lamp of religion is continually being trimmed by anxious and faithful hands, and though the results are nothing to boast of, who desires to boast? We have reason to hope—we have an incentive to more work—and that is enough.

It has been a great pain for me to part from the many good friends I have made in East Anglia. I bear away inspiring memories. The pleasantest news of old friends I can possibly have in the new country will be to hear that our churches are alive and active in the cause of God and man.

Our vessel is passing just now over waters that bore the ship of the Apostle Paul on that last sad voyage to Rome. Over against us on our left rises the island of Cauda, where "there arose a tempestuous wind called Euraquilo," and they were able with difficulty to secure the boat. But lately we passed through the Straits of Messina and passed Reggio, where he landed from Malta, in Italy.

There comes to my remembrance his sublime self-confidence in the face of danger. "There stood by me this night an angel of the God whose I am, whom also I serve, saying 'Fear not Paul; thou must yet stand before Cæsar.'" "Wherefore, sirs," he said to the trembling sailors, "be of good cheer, for I believe God."

Let us all conjure up this same spirit when our cause seems hopeless, let us trust the God whose we are, and whom we serve. And it is certain we may trust Him, if so be we serve Him well.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEAL.

Bermondsey.—The Rev. Harold Rylett writes that he has so far managed to do without a Poor's Purse, but he now finds the need of a little help, having one or two cases requiring assistance beyond his present resources.

Ainsworth.—The annual Sunday-school prize distribution and scholars' party was held last Saturday. After tea the Rev. M. R. Scott presided. Apologies for non-attendance through illness were sent from Mr. Thos. Holt and the Rev. J. A. Lauria (vicar of Ainsworth). The very inclement weather also prevented the Rev. J. C. Odgers, B.A., from being present. The report read by the secretary (Mr. W. Sellars) showed the school to be in a very flourishing condition. The prizes were distributed by the minister's wife, Mrs. Scott. A good programme of songs, recitations, &c., was gone through, concluding with the operetta, Nursery Rhymes. The party was well attended and a thorough success.

Crumlin.—The annual meeting of the First Presbyterian (Non-Subscribing) Church was held on Feb. 9, and was well attended. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. J. Hall, and the annual report and treasurer's statement were submitted and adopted. From the former it appeared that several of the young people of the congregation had enrolled their names upon the list of stipend payers, thus becoming fully qualified members, and, like neighbouring congregations, an offer had been received from Sir John Murray Scott to give a lump sum in lieu of the annual subscription hitherto sent from the Wallace estate. The treasurer's statement showed a small balance in hand after all liabilities had been discharged. The office-bearers for the year having been appointed, an interesting programme, consisting of songs, readings, and recitations was rendered. The benediction brought a very enjoyable evening to a close.

Dunmurry.—The annual congregational meeting of the First Presbyterian (Non-Subscribing) Church was held in the Courthouse, Dunmurry, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 6. Tea having been dispensed, the Rev. J. A. Kelly was called to the chair, and in a brief and most practical address explained the various objects of the meeting. A resolution was passed by acclamation, conveying to Mr. H. J. McCance, D.L., an expression of pleasure at the news of his progress towards recovery after a long and severe illness, and the hope that he would soon be able to be among the congregation again. The report and congregational accounts for 1899 having been submitted by the secretary and treasurer, were passed. The necessity for appointing new trustees for the congregational property having arisen, these were appointed. Mrs. Scott having resigned the local treasurership of the Orphan Society, a hearty vote of thanks was tendered to her for her services in the past. Votes of thanks were also accorded to Mr. Wm. M. Boomer for past services, on his resignation of the collectorship for the Sustentation Fund, to the ladies for presiding at tea, and to the Chairman. The meeting was concluded by singing the National Anthem.

Evesham.—Two memorial windows of stained glass have recently been placed in the Oat-street Chapel. One, as a brass plate, records, "In memory of Anthony Martin and Maria his wife and of Mary Dunn, for forty-eight years their devoted and faithful servant." This window has been given by Mr. A. H. Martin, the secretary of the congregation, and Mrs. Martin. The other window, given by Mrs. Gibson, is in memory of the Rev. Matthew Gibson, the evening of whose life was spent at Evesham, and bears his monogram and the date of his death, 1896. Both windows are from the studio of Mr. Gilbert Gamon, of Oxford-street, London.

Gateshead.—The Rev. A. Harvie has printed an order for a "Martineau Memorial Service," to be used at various places in his district, and will be glad to send a copy to anyone contemplating the holding of such a service.

Gloucester.—The meetings of the Barton-street Chapel Literary and Social Union were resumed on Wednesday week, under the presidency of Mr. W. C. Washbourne. The first part of the programme consisted of a concert, after which the Rev. Walter Lloyd delivered a lecture on "The Life and Writings of the Rev. John Pomfrett" (1667-1702). One of Pomfrett's poems, "Reason," was suggested by the Unitarian controversy. Dr. Johnson said of another, "The Choice," that perhaps no composition in our language had been so often perused. Pomfrett is now almost forgotten. A vote of thanks to the musicians and Mr. Lloyd concluded the proceedings.

Halifax: Northgate-end Branch School and Meeting-room.—Last Sunday anniversary services were held, and, notwithstanding the difficulty of traffic in the streets owing to a heavy fall of snow, were well attended. Two very appropriate sermons were preached by Mr. Charles Stainer, of Leeds. The collections amounted to nearly £6.

Liverpool.—The annual meeting of the Liverpool Postal Mission was held at the Unitarian Institute on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 10, when, through the hospitality of the Misses McConnell, about forty friends met for tea and business, the chair being taken by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. The condition of the weather was quite sufficient to account for the small attendance. The report of the year's work was decidedly encouraging, the number of new applications exceeding that of any previous year, while the work among the old correspondents was about the same. In reading the statement of accounts the treasurer called attention to the fact, that for the first time for some years there was a deficit, mainly due to the greater amount spent in books, which was nearly double that of 1898. This was a very necessary expense, as, in order to be thoroughly efficient, the library must be supplied with all the best works; and it was especially advisable to procure what were needed, before the issue of the new catalogue of books, which the committee are bringing out and which will, of course, be an extra item in the expenses of the current year. The work of the Postal Mission is steadily growing, and during the last three years the correspondents have increased in number from 117 to 331. The spirit of inquiry, and the desire to personally investigate theological questions, seems spreading, and many of the letters received show clearly how much the work is appreciated.

London: Highgate.—The memorial sermon on Dr. Martineau, preached by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, M.A., on Sunday, Jan. 21, which appeared in full in the Christian Life, has now been separately printed and may be had from the Christian Life Publishing Company, Essex Hall.

London: Peckham.—The annual Sunday-school tea and prize distribution took place at Avondale-road, on Monday under the presidency of the Rev. G. Carter (superintendent), supported by Mr. J. C. Griffin (deputy-superintendent), Mr. W. R. Marshall (secretary and treasurer), Mrs. W. R. Marshall, Mrs. G. Griffin, Miss Bredall (teachers) and Mrs. Bredall, who gave a most helpful address. On the Sunday evening preceding the meeting, the Rev. G. Carter, in his address, strongly urged the importance of definite theological instruction in the home and the Sunday-school, attributing to the neglect of this the alienation of many of our young people from the Unitarian Church, and their relapse into mere agnosticism or attachment to orthodox communities. There should be no fear of sectarian narrowness in the simple affirmation of the cardinal points in Unitarian faith—the all-embracing love of the Father, the noble humanity of Jesus, the helpfulness of direct communion with God, and the glorious hope of immortal life.

Manchester and the London Bazaar.—A most successful soirée was held at the Memorial Hall, on Monday week, its principal object being to arouse interest in the churches of the district in connection with the Manchester stall at the coming London Bazaar. The ladies of the district are working in hearty co-operation, and are determined to show their London friends in a very practical manner how much they appreciate the help rendered by them to Manchester in the great effort a little more than two years ago. The arrangements for the soirée were made with enthusiasm by the Ladies' Bazaar Committee, and it was a great success. The hall, which was kindly lent free of charge by the trustees, was carpeted, and arranged in drawing-room fashion, as far as possible. Small tables were dotted about, on which were placed flowers and books. A capital programme of entertainment was provided, and included musical and dramatic items, which were much enjoyed. The ladies had determined that the soirée should not only be a source of enjoyment, but also a source of revenue. Consequently, with energy and persuasiveness, they obtained practically everything gratis, themselves setting a good example by providing the refreshments, &c., free of cost, so that a considerable sum will be handed over to the treasurer of the Bazaar stall. The feature of the evening was, however, an unexpected one. A few days prior to the soirée it leaked out that Mrs. Blake Odgers was coming North for a short visit, and a pressing invitation was sent to her to be present and to say a few words. She kindly consented, and during the evening she made a really brilliant little speech, which made everybody feel an unbounded interest in the Bazaar. It was descriptive, it was witty, and it was concise, and yet it seemed to leave nothing out that was calculated to arouse our sympathy. Between 300 and 400 tickets were sold, though not quite all who purchased tickets put in an appearance. Everybody has been talking about the soirée since, and saying what a good and helpful thing for the life of our churches it would be if some such gathering could be held annually; and it is evident that, if they could all be made not less interesting than this one, the Memorial Hall would not be large enough to accommodate all who would desire to come. The promoters are to be heartily congratulated upon their marked success, and we thank our London friends for the occasion which their needs afforded.

Manchester: Memorial Hall.—The thirty-fourth annual meeting of the Trustees was held at the Hall, on Friday, Feb. 9, Mr. Harry Rawson, chairman of the trustees, presiding. The report showed that free use of the rooms had been granted to the Manchester District Unitarian Association, the Sunday-school Association, the Postal Mission, the Domestic Mission, and other institutions and societies 146 times, as against 136 in the previous year; also the Unitarian Home Missionary College for classes, lectures, committee meetings, &c. The treasurer (Mr. G. S. Woolley) presented the accounts, which showed that, owing to the cost of the installation of the electric light, the balance on hand was so small as to render the trustees unable, to their sincere regret, to make any grants this year to schools, missions, churches, &c. It was reported that owing to the decease, during some years past, of four trustees and the resignation of another, it was necessary to elect five new trustees. The following were unanimously appointed:—Messrs. G. H. Leigh, Henry Lupton, and H. P. Greg (sons of former trustees), with Mr. William Long and Mr. Arthur H. Worthington. In accordance with an amiable provision of the trust deed, the business being transacted, the trustees proceeded to "dine together." The dinner was served at the Manchester Reform Club. Mr. George Wm. Rayner Wood presided, and the following guests were present:—Revs. Alex. Gordon, M.A., J. E. Manning, M.A., C. T. Poynting, B.A., W. E. Atack, Priestley Prime, and Jenkyn Thomas; Messrs. Edward Talbot, M.A., John Chadwick, and E. W. Marshall. After the toast of "The Queen," the Chairman called upon the Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., who, in eloquent terms, proposed "The Memory of Dr. Martineau," the company rising in respectful silence. The Chairman, in an interesting speech, made reference to his ministerial ancestors, and proposed "The Memorial Hall," in acknowledging which the Chairman of the Trustees, traced the origin of the Hall to the establishment of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, to find suitable accommodation for which the hall was suggested by the late Rev. Dr. Beard, who was practically the founder of both institutions. In conclusion, he offered a cordial welcome to the guests, and alluded to the proposed Willaston School, which he strongly commended to the attention and sympathy of all the Free Churches. Mr. Long and Mr. H. P. Greg having spoken, Mr. John Dendy proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Wood for his conduct in the chair, which he briefly acknowledged.

Manchester: Sale.—The Saturday evening entertainments for children, which have been recently organised, have proved a great success. The children are admitted on payment of one-halfpenny, and seem thoroughly to appreciate what is done for them. The entertainments have consisted of lantern shows and other forms of amusement, and a lady member of the Guild has given instruction in musical drill. At the usual weekly meeting of the Social Guild a paper was read by the Rev. Jas. Forrest, M.A., on "Socialism: What it is and what it might do for us." As was to be expected, the paper gave rise to a lively discussion. In addition to the above activities connected with this church a reading circle has recently been formed, and is now dealing with some of Ruskin's works.

Northampton.—Many of the members and friends of the Kettering-road Church met together in the upper schoolroom on Tuesday evening, Feb. 6, when the Rev. T. W. Freckelton, formerly minister of the congregation, delivered a "Eulogy on the late Dr. Martineau," to whose memory a very high tribute of admiration and affection was paid. For an hour and a quarter the audience were held in closest attention, and showed their keen appreciation in a warm and unmistakable way. The Rev. John Byles presided, and with a few well-chosen words expressed the gratitude of all present. Preaching at Kettering-road Church on Sunday last, at the conclusion of his evening sermon, the Rev. John Byles spoke as follows:—"I am no pessimist, my wont through life has been to take a hopeful view both of things personal and public. But never in the whole course of my experience has the National outlook seemed to me so gloomy as it does to-day, or the 'signs of the times' so dark and threatening. It is not simply that we are at war—we have often been at war before; it is not merely that we have had reverses—reverses at times must be expected by those who challenge the arbitrament of the sword—even the legions of Rome had their experiences of defeats; but what troubles me is the war spirit—the love of war, the gloating over war, the contempt, and the almost malignant hatred shown to those who dare to oppose war and to profess themselves the friends of peace. What troubles and disturbs me is the gross materialism which is behind the whole, the cry for Empire, the greed for gold, the loss of high ideals, the refusal to allow that ethics have to do with politics, and that amid the clash of arms and the conflict of races the spirit of Christ has any place or any claim—these are the things that cause me disquietude. To me it seems that we are standing, as a nation, on the very brink of a precipice, from which, if God in His mercy do not rescue us, we shall assuredly fall into, it may be, irretrievable disaster. Imperialism, as all history shows, obeys a regular law of progression; there is an appointed sequence of growth, culmination and decay. The series may be lengthy, but the last item is always ruin! The strife between the two ideals—the material and the moral—will not end with the present unhappy conflict in South Africa; it will be carried on during the long years that follow, unless indeed the lessons of Providence are too startling and too terrible for the blindest to overlook them. It will be probably the great battle of this coming century. And what England during these coming years will need is men of principle, men who believe in the application of principle to things public as well as to things private, men who believe in Humanity and Brotherhood. What England will need is men who will dare to espouse the unpopular side, who will be willing for the sake of truth and righteousness to be scoffed at and reviled, to be stigmatised as the associates and confederates of people whom society looked upon as disreputable—'friends of publicans and sinners.' What England will need, is men who will be willing to forego worldly success, and endure material loss, if only the cause of a true humanity can be advanced. These are the men whom England needs if she is to escape the dangers that beset her. To themselves it may not seem as though they accomplish much, but at least they will liberate their own souls; at least they will be able to respect themselves. And beyond this they will prepare the way for others, and make their path the smoother; something will have been accomplished for the country and the world, and for themselves they will have 'taken their part in suffering hardship, as true soldiers of Jesus Christ.'"

Nottage.—On Wednesday week a very pleasant social tea was held, and on the following evening the younger classes of the Sunday-school had a tea party, at which some of the children gave a capital rendering of Mr. Hawkes's adaptation of Beauty and the Beast. The children had been trained by Mrs. Phillips, wife of the minister.

Oxford: Charles-street Institute.—The annual meeting was held on Tuesday, Feb. 13, the Rev. Dr. Drummond in the chair. The report, which had been printed, and was taken as read, stated that except on three occasions Sunday evening services had been held regularly throughout the year, conducted chiefly by Manchester College students. The Sunday-school showed a slight increase, and weekly meetings had been held of a Mothers' Meeting, a Recreation Class, Band of Hope, and Band of Mercy, a Men's Social Meeting, and an Industrial Class. A provident bank for the women had also proved useful. The accounts showed a balance of £10, but more than this would be required by way of additional income in the coming year, as it was hoped to arrange for the services to be regularly conducted by one person. Mr. Andreae moved the adoption of the report, and gave an interesting account of his "Men's Meeting," which he hoped would soon become a self-supporting club. The Rev. J. E. Carpenter, in seconding, spoke appreciatively of the work being done in the Sunday-school, and at the various classes held on week evenings. He pointed out that the Mothers' Meeting had not taken so firm a footing as in his experience he had seen such meetings do in other towns, and to those who knew the neighbourhood that was not surprising, as there were so many similar meetings in connection with the Church of England which offer much greater advantages than the Institute workers would feel justified in offering. Dr. Drummond stated that he quite coincided with the opinion of the Committee, that it would be better if the conduct of the Sunday evening services could be placed in the hands of one person instead of being left to casual helpers, and accordingly it was unanimously decided to appoint Mr. E. A. Hillier, late of Deal, who was willing to take the services, and assist generally in the work of the Institute. It is hoped that he may carry on the work at least until October next. The meeting terminated with the reappointment of Miss J. Upton as superintendent, and Mr. John Cotton as treasurer and secretary, and of a committee for the present year.

Oxford: Church of the Divine Love.—On Thursday, Feb. 1, through the kindness of a generous friend, a tea-party and magic-lantern entertainment were given to the Sunday-school children. About fifty were present in ages from four to fifteen. All thoroughly enjoyed themselves and behaved very well.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held last Sunday after morning service, when the report and accounts were adopted, delegates to the National Conference were appointed, and the thanks of the congregation were accorded to the donors of stained-glass windows, which have greatly added to the appearance of the chapel. The eight ground floor windows of the chapel have been filled with special designs, prepared by Mr. Henry Holiday, of Hampstead, according to the instructions of Mr. Hugh Stannus. The subjects are as follows:—(1) Presented by Mrs. Kirke and Mr. J. B. Wostinholm, "The Pool of Bethesda"; (2) presented by the family of the late Mr. Alfred Beckett, "The Visit to the Temple"; (3) presented by the family of the late Mr. W. E. Laycock, "The Feeding of the Five Thousand"; (4) presented by Mrs. Eadon, "The Woman of Samaria"; (5) presented by Mrs. Bramley, "The Sower." Mrs. Bramley also presented the three windows which have no central design, but whose ground-work, similarly to that in the other five, is constructed of antique glass of various shades of green. The accounts, on a total of £639 8s., showed a balance of £85 10s. 3d. in hand. The bi-centenary of the congregation is to be celebrated in the autumn of the present year.

Southern Unitarian Association.—At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee, held at the Kell Schools, Southampton, the following resolution on the death of Dr. Martineau was unanimously passed:—"That the members of the Committee of the Southern Association assembled in quarterly meeting desire to put on record their sense of the great loss which the Free Churches of our denomination, and the world at large, have sustained in the death of the Rev. Dr. Martineau. All who have been privileged to know him have felt the impress of his commanding and magnetic personality. All who have read his works have felt the influence of his fervent faith and of his brilliant genius. His presence here in his dignified and honoured old age was a benediction and an inspiration to all who revered him, and through his cherished memory, he, though dead, will speak with still greater power." The mover and seconder, the Revs. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, and E. S. Anthony, of Poole, were former students of Dr. Martineau's at Manchester College; the resolution was supported by the Rev. C. E. Pike, of Newport, I.W., and Mr. George Cosens Prior, of Portsmouth.

Swansea.—The annual meeting of the members of the Unitarian Church took place on Thursday week, Mr. J. Moy Evans in the chair. The report was presented by Mr. C. H. Perkins, the hon. secretary, and was of a very satisfactorily nature. To the zealous ministry of the Rev. W. Tudor Jones was mainly attributed the increasing prosperity of the church. In addition to Mr. Jones' unflagging attention to the work of the church, he had attended all the meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Society, and the meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London and Bristol. He had also contributed a paper to the Royal Geographical Society on "The Place of Geographical Distribution in Religious Belief," arising from which he had been elected a fellow of that Society. The report mentioned the visits of the Rev. J. E. Manning, and of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke and others, when very large congregations assembled. On May 5, the musical festival of the Glamorganshire Unitarian choirs was held in Swansea, the Castle-street Congregational Chapel being most kindly lent for the occasion by its minister and deacons. Attention was called to the bazaar and meetings in aid of the church, which will be held on the 18th and 19th of April at the Shaftesbury Hall, Swansea, work in connection with which was in full progress. It was felt that besides the advantage of the material aid that may be expected to arise the opportunity thus afforded for all to unite in a common object in connection with it would be most valuable. The financial position of church showed a full participation in its improved condition. Mr. David Harris followed with an interesting account of the Sunday-school and the Band of Hope, both of which were progressing well. The officers and committee were re-elected and cordial votes of thanks were passed.

"A CHARACTER," as J. S. Mill says, "is a completely fashioned will." A tendency to act only becomes effectively engrained in us in proportion to the uninterrupted frequency with which the actions usually occur and the brain "grows" to their use. When a resolve or a fine glow of feeling is allowed to evaporate without bearing practical fruit, it is worse than a chance lost. It works so as positively to hinder future resolutions and emotions from taking the normal path of discharge. We all intend, when young, to be all that may become a man before the destroyer cuts us down. But we do not begin to-day. We forget that every good that is worth possessing must be paid for in strokes of daily effort. We postpone and postpone until these smiling possibilities are dead. By neglecting the necessary concrete labours, by sparing ourselves the little daily tax, we are positively digging the graves of our higher possibilities.—Prof. W. James.

SUSTENTATION FUND

For the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends.

At the ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING held in Dr. Williams's Library, London, on Wednesday, 7th February, 1900, WILLIAM LONG, Esq., President, in the Chair,

The Annual Report and Balance Sheet having been read, it was

RESOLVED:—

That the Report and Accounts, as now read, be adopted and printed for circulation among the Contributors and Friends of the Fund.

That the Annual Meeting of the Sustentation Fund records, on its own behalf, and on that of all its subscribers and friends, the sincerest regret at the decease of Sir Henry Tate, Bart. To him is due a deep debt of gratitude. He was the first and most liberal of its promoters, and may indeed be regarded as practically its founder. Many of its subscribers had the honour of his personal friendship, and all appreciated in the highest degree his prompt and munificent support.

That this resolution be entered on the Minutes, and a copy thereof be forwarded to Lady Tate, with the respectful condolence of the Board with herself and the family.

That the retiring Managers, Messrs. George Brown, Charles Harding, William Long, David Martineau, and Frank Preston, whose term of office has expired, being duly nominated, and the requisite number of voting papers being produced, be and are hereby re-elected as Managers of the Fund.

That the resignation of Mr. Ernest W. Enfield be accepted with regret, and that Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leicester, be appointed to fill the vacancy thus created on the Board of Management.

That the sincere thanks of the Contributors be given to William Long, Esq., for his services as President during the past year, and that he be elected President for the year 1900.

That the thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke for his services as Honorary Treasurer during the past year, and that he be appointed Treasurer for the coming year.

That Messrs. H. Rawson and A. W. Worthington be elected as Honorary Secretaries.

That the services of Mr. Edwin W. Marshall, as Honorary Auditor, be gratefully acknowledged, and that he be requested to accept the office for the year 1900.

That the thanks of the Contributors be given to the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, who have courteously granted the use of rooms for the Meetings of the Fund during the past year.

That the thanks of the Meeting be given to the President for his services in the Chair.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WHILE the claims of sufferers from the War in South Africa have been met by a very warm response from generous givers throughout the country, it is earnestly to be hoped that other very urgent needs will not be neglected. India is confronted in the Central Provinces with a famine of unparalleled magnitude, and a Mansion House Fund, opened by the Lord Mayor to help in the relief of the distress, had amounted by Thursday morning to over £70,000. Speaking at a public meeting in Calcutta, held to inaugurate a famine fund, the Viceroy announced that the Queen had given a donation of £1,000. The British India Steamship Company gave £5,000, and several native Princes have made generous response.

WE have received at the same time a renewed appeal from the "Friends of Armenia," for help to meet the distress caused by famine in that unhappy land. In the province of Van, Dr. Raynolds writes that the Christian population is being slowly exterminated by the continued distress, while in the city the Industrial Bureau and the Orphanage do all that is possible, up to the limit of their means, to alleviate the misery. But the number of applicants is always far greater than it is possible to cope with, and Dr. Raynolds adds: "Indeed, we all feel that existence is hardly endurable for ourselves when we must constantly endure the sight of so much suffering without the power to relieve it." Contributions should be sent to the hon. treasurer, H. M. Ferguson, Esq., at 47, Victoria-street, Westminster, S.W., cheques to be crossed London and Westminster Bank.

THE Bishop of London held his Primary Visitation in St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday morning, and addressed his clergy on the subject of recent controversies in the Church. He regretted those controversies, as having given rise to suspicion and retarded spiritual work, but yet they had educated the people; for while only experts could decide the points at issue, the decisions must rest on principles understood by the people, and satisfy the demands of their conscience. Liberty, which had its root in religion, was essential to the English Church, of which the fruit must be strong character, with conscience as supreme arbiter. England had thought deeply and felt seriously on the subject of the Mass and of compulsory private confession, and was determined to avoid the temper from which such abuses arose. They were hindrances in the way of adapting the services of the Church to the requirements of modern life. The custom of fasting communion had arisen at a time when for all classes the first mealtime was at noon. Now that habits had changed they need not abjure reason in order to follow a Catholic custom, and fasting communion should not be insisted on. He had no fear of England being priest-ridden. The clergy had no right to insist on compulsory confession.

A TRAINING college for Sunday-school teachers was opened on Monday at Handsworth, Birmingham, established by the local Nonconformist Sunday School Union. The college will at present accommodate twenty resident students, who must be young men of approved Christian character. The fees for tuition, board, and lodging are 14s. a week. The work of the college will be done in the evening, the students being engaged in their ordinary occupations during the day. Non-resident students of both sexes will be admitted to the classes on a small payment. The college was opened by Dr. R. F. Horton, and afterwards a public meeting was held in the Hamstead-road Baptist Church. A teacher, to-day, said Dr. Horton, to be fully qualified, needed, in addition to religious fitness, to understand something of mental processes and methods of teaching, and to keep abreast of theological knowledge and the discoveries which throw light on the Scriptures. To meet such needs by systematic training the college is established. There are already eight resident students, and as the Union embraces 140 schools with 3,800 members, it is expected that the whole number will soon be made up. Mr. George Shipway has been appointed warden.

THE Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, who for forty-four years has been minister of the South Congregational Church in Boston, having resigned his charge, was at a recent parish meeting elected pastor Emeritus. The resolution passed on the occasion was a heartfelt tribute to Dr. Hale's devoted services and inspiring influence. In terms of reverence and affection the resolution speaks of what he has been to his congregation for nearly half a century.

To feel it as we feel it now is our benediction upon him. Heaven brought near to us, the good God a real presence, the sanctities of character and life and home and business strengthened—such has been the fruit of his ministry; and it has been maturing in countless lives through these long years.

In succession to Dr. Hale, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, at present secretary of the American Unitarian Association has been unanimously elected minister of the church. We hear, also, that the Rev. Albert Lazenby, formerly of Glasgow, has accepted an invitation to Unity Church, Chicago, Robert Collyer's old church.

THE commentary on the greater Epistles of St. Paul by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, which is the first volume issued of the International Handbooks to the New Testament, edited by Dr. Orello Cone, and published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, of New York and London, is now to be had in this country. The published price is 7s. 6d., and it will be seen from an advertisement in another column that anyone sending 6s. to Mr. Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C, before March 1, will receive a copy of the book, post free. The Epistles to the Thessalonians, Corinthians, Galatians, Romans, and Philippians, are those dealt with in this volume, which will be found of the utmost value to all earnest students of the New Testament.

THE late Sir Henry Tate, one of the most generous of men, and wise in his generosity, made his great public benefactions during his life-time. The particulars of his will, which are now published, show that the remainder of his wealth, amounting to over a million sterling, is divided, for the most part, among the members of his family, though a few personal friends and faithful servants are also remembered. Among the friends we are glad to note the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, who receives £500. Mr. Tarrant, it will be remembered, conducted the funeral service for Sir Henry Tate. He was the first student to proceed from the Home Missionary College to Manchester College as Tate scholar. It is pleasant to know that Sir Henry Tate has left to his children ample means to maintain the noble tradition of his own beneficence.

DR. MARTINEAU AND THE PORTLAND BRITISH SCHOOLS.

SHORTLY after Dr. Martineau and his revered colleague entered upon their joint ministry at Little Portland-street Chapel in 1858, they not only formed the Sunday School (in which so many of their students acquired practical instruction in that part of ministerial duty), but they saw the good it would be to provide the neighbourhood with some sort of undenominational elementary day-school. The district was permeated, and still is permeated, with sectarian poor-schools, where acceptance of the dogmas of a stated Church or Chapel was as much expected as the due payment of the weekly pence fees; and, commencing to give day-schooling to the children of the working-classes free from this embargo in a set of rooms in Newman-street, then removing to a whole but small house in Riding House-street, Dr. Martineau saw his time, in the middle sixties, to aim at founding and erecting the fine block of buildings known as the Portland British School. It was capable of holding some 500 children, even more; it always had some 400 scholars on its books; and there, for some twenty years, Dr. Martineau was personally and actively engaged in its administration, every item, from the choice of a head-master to the decision as to the adoption of improved drainage, getting its proper moment of consideration from him.

The great enterprise that it was, and the responsibility it entailed, must be recalled. Mr. Forster's Education Act of 1870 was not in view, even; consequently there was no commodious structure rising here and there, and known to us as a Board-school, to stimulate and to pioneer. Yet Dr. Martineau's influence over his congregation was such that he succeeded in raising from them between £6,000 and £7,000 for his purpose; in kindling a like aim to his own amongst those (such as Miss Anna Swanwick) most immediately connected with him; and, having been able to lease premises in the rear of Riding House-street, south, commanding an additional entrance in Little Titchfield-street, at the depth of five houses back, it was soon given to him to see the building work itself through from the one street to the other, exactly as it can be seen to-day.

The business—it might be said, the drudgery of the minutiæ compulsorily arising from passing into the area of the Education Department (Matthew Arnold chanced to be the first Inspector)—was not shirked by Dr. Martineau. The expenditure of the schools, of which teachers' salaries amounted finally to over £700, was about £1,300 annually (to attend to the hand-to-hand disposal of which there was a committee, with an executive of president, treasurer, and hon. sec.); and though to meet this large sum there were three separate sources of subscriptions, scholars' pence, and Government grant, the second of these had in time to be abolished in the face of Free Education, and there was no avoiding many an anxious moment when the accounts at the yearly overhauling showed a deficit; and at such times Dr. Martineau's own pen made abstracts from the annual reports as to attendance, as to receipts, as to results, &c., trying to fathom the cause of fluctuation and remedy it, and Dr. Martineau's own purse was of those which took the lead in clearing the deficiency away.

What his presence was at these Committee Councils (embracing here those of the Sunday-school, as well as of the day-school), and what it was to the staff, has to be learnt by what it is known to have been in his College affairs and among his students. Its measurement cannot be taken. As he brought with him dignity and unswerving truth, so he commanded the expectation of dignity and unswerving truth from all within the school walls; and though, in such a perpetual stream of scholars and employés, there were instances of the infirmities of human nature, the standard by which morals were judged was that to which Dr. Martineau raised it, and many scores of boys and girls have grown up into young men and women since he founded the Portland building, whose characters are more solid, more upright, for what, unconsciously to them, and certainly unconsciously to himself, he disseminated.

That these day-schools passed over to the London School Board on Sept. 1, 1898, seemed to Dr. Martineau to be the right issue. The theological episode in the Council of the Board had ended in the victory of the Undenominational Flag, by which standpoint he had been aroused, and for which he had striven; and this probably made him no longer see the necessity for calling upon a narrowing circle of friends to subscribe money to obtain the same ends. But the moral tone emanating from him could not be withdrawn by the transfer, for, out of the teachers comprising the present staff, there are three who were scholars during his active supervision, and thus his impress on their lives, and from them to their scholars, is not likely to suffer eradication. Similar words can be applied to the personnel of the Portland Sunday School and Institute (evenings) now occupying the attention of the remainder of the trustees and subscribers. Amongst those who rule there are some who are indebted, either primarily or secondarily, to Dr. Martineau's influence. In these, that influence may be safely let to abide.

To those who were part and parcel of either the Sunday-school or day-school, or both, during Dr. Martineau's occupancy of the Little Portland-street pulpit, there will come many a memory out of what has just been said. They will recollect his presence at the annual parents' party, where he addressed the men and women with the readiest understanding of their needs in life and their duties, and with an eloquent and cultivated geniality thoroughly appreciated. They will recollect his presence at the annual summer-day excursion, where he has walked at the head of the procession of children to the railway station, and has joined in the games of cricket, skipping, and so forth, for as many hours as he could spare. A privileged one or two will remember his carrying the head-master's little son round the boys' school upon his shoulder, that the child might examine the pictures in the detail it desired; these will remember how, when he was his own superintendent of the afternoon Sunday-school, his mode of speech to an individual child was not austere, not repellant, but softened with the pretty endearment of "love"; and one additional memory will be how, not more than three years since, he witnessed some combined exercises in marching, singing, "actions," &c., in the infants' school, patiently sitting through the whole, though it lasted as long as half-an-hour.

Truly, he had his eyes striving to see beyond the stars, yet his feet were planted where he could fulfil the obligations he thought due to his career upon the earth. And that is an example which can be taken to the hearts even of those who never saw his face.

JENNETT HUMPHREYS.

THE LATE DR. MARTINEAU.—The following communication addressed to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has been received from Bishop Ferencz:—"The meeting of the Representative Consistory of the Hungarian Churches, held on Jan. 27, received the sad news of Dr. Martineau's death with the deepest regret. Dr. Martineau's death was a great loss, not only to his family, but to all of us, and specially to you, our English Unitarian brethren. Dr. Martineau was our pride and glory. His bright mind, his eloquence, his philosophical works, which created great interest in the world of letters, his indefatigable work for the cause of Unitarianism and liberal Christianity, his great influence upon his pupils, and upon all those who came near him, we recognise as great blessings of God. We thank Divine Providence for his gifts to us, and we pray that Dr. Martineau's spirit may never cease to inspire the members of our community; and we trust his light, his truth, and love may give us strength in our efforts to spread freedom of thought further and further." From the meeting of the Representative Consistory of the Hungarian Unitarians, held at Kolozsvar, Jan. 27, 1900.—JOSEPH FERENCZ (Bishop of the Hungarian Unitarians), SOLOMON CSIFO (secretary).

IT matters little where we are, and not so very much what we do if our occupation be honest. We can live a noble life anywhere. We can think anywhere, and absorb from experience what it is really worth. It is well, then, not to look for happiness alone, nor for success, nor should we expect to find just such an environment as we desire. Ideals are seldom realised quickly. Disappointments are sure to come. The essential is contentment, manly performance of the task at hand, plenty of patient reflection, and trust—trust that in due time we shall know why we are placed as we are.—A. G. Dresser.

ROGER ASCHAM.—II.

ROGER ASCHAM'S book, entitled "Toxophilus," is also, like "The Schoolmaster," educational; but it deals with an art which had been of paramount and suzerain importance in English military affairs, the art of Archery. Ascham was a Bow-and-Arrow intoxicated man. Toxophilus is the Lover of Archery. The book is composed in the form of a dialogue between Toxophilus, the Lover of Archery, and Philologus, the Lover of Learning, and it is in general in praise of, and in support of, Learning and Arms, of Education and Archery (as England's then special strength), of the Booke and the Bowe, as Ascham himself terms it. In the first edition of his book there is his quaint title-page, representing the Arms of England, surmounted by the crown, and at the left hand is a book, with the word veritas stamped upon it, and on the right hand are a bow and arrow with the word vincit, and on two scrolls are certain Latin lines thus quaintly Englished by him, and which give a general insight into the nature of his book, which is as interesting as "The Schoolmaster" for its glimpses of his own times, and of the men and manners of those times.

Rejoice England, be gladde and merie,
Trothe overcommeth thyne enemyes all.
The Scot, the Frenchman, the Pope, and heresie,
Overcommed by Trothe, have had a fall.
Sticke to the Trothe, and evermore thou shall Through Christ, King Henry, the Booke, and the Bowe
All manner of enemies, quite overthrowe.

"Toxophilus" was written when Ascham was but twenty-nine years of age, and dedicated and presented to Henry VIII., who granted him a pension for it, which remained with him through his reign and the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. The book is not only remarkable for its delightful treatment of its special theme of Archery, but it was written with another object as well. It would have been easier for him to have written it in Latin or Greek, but he determined to write it in English "with the view of presenting the people with a specimen of a purer and more correct English style than that to which they had hitherto been accustomed, and with the hope of calling the attention of the learned from the exclusive study of Greek and Latin to the cultivation of their own language." It was, to use a familiar German expression, "an epoch-making book." It succeeded in that object at least, for very soon "we find harmony and beauty in English style emphatically praised and enjoined." But the days of the bow and arrow were numbered, and this book was the eloquent funeral oration of this method of warfare, though Roger Ascham little seemed to suspect it. But it affords an intensely interesting chapter of our military history, and reveals in a surprising manner how much it was needful to know in order to be a good archer, whether in time of peace or war, and "not only," as Professor Arber says, "are the main arguments interwoven with a most earnest moral purpose, but they are enlivened by frequent and charming discussions in the which he often lays down great principles, or illustrates them from the circumstances of his time."

The educational purpose was ever foremost in Ascham's mind; and he was a man who, as we saw in his other book, did not believe in punishing and plucking up or burning down weeds; he thought if the right course were once established punishment would be little needed, and the weeds would have little chance of putting in an appearance. He was a vigilant schoolmaster, and would have made a vigilant statesman. Here is a weighty reflection, for example, which seems only now to be seeing a chance of being acted upon more generally.

This commoditie (or advantage) should follow also if the youth of England were taught to shoot, that even as plowing of a good ground for wheat doth not only make it meet for the seed, but also riveth and plucketh up by the roots all thistles, brambles and weeds, which grow of their own accord, to the destruction of both corn and ground: even so should the teaching of youth to shoot, not only make them shoot well, but also pluck away by the roots all other desire to naughty pastimes, as dicing, carding, bowling, which without any teaching are used everywhere, to the great harm of all youth of this realm. And likewise as burning of thistles and diligent weeding them out of the corn, doth not half so much rid them as when the ground is fallowed and tilled for good grain, as I have heard many a good husbandman say: even so, neither hot punishment, nor yet diligent searching out of such unthriftiness by the officers, shall so thoroughly weed these ungracious games out of the realm as occupying and bringing up youth in shooting and other honest pastime."

And the following fine passage is a veritable little sermon applicable to very much more than to archery, and Ascham meant it so to apply. The moral is on the surface:—

The chief cause why men cannot shoot straight is because they look at their shaft; and this fault cometh because a man is not taught to shoot when he is young. If he learneth to shoot by himself he is afraid to pull the shaft through the bow, and therefore looketh always at his shaft; ill use confirmeth this fault as it doth many more. Men have tried many ways, but they are all shifts and not to be followed in shooting straight. For having a man's eye always on his mark is the only way to shoot straight, yea, and I suppose so ready and easy a way if it be learned in youth and confirmed with use that a man shall never miss therein. . . . Some men wonder why in casting a man's eye at the mark, the hand should go straight. Surely if he considered the nature of a man's eye, he would not wonder at it. For this I am certain of, that no servant to his master, no child to his father is so obedient, as every joint and piece of the body is to do whatsoever the eye bids. The eye is the guide, the ruler and the succourer of all the other parts. The hand, the foot, and other members dare do nothing without the eye as doth appear on the night and dark corners. The eye is the very tongue wherewith wit and reason doth speak to every part of the body, and the wit doth not so soon signify a thing by the eye, as every part is ready to follow, or rather to prevent (i.e., anticipate) the bidding of the eye. This is plain in many things, but most evident in fence and fighting, as I have heard men say. There every part standing in fear to have a blow, runs to the eye for help, as young children do to the mother: the foot, the hand and all waiteth upon the eye: and that which is most wonder of all, the one man looking steadfastly at the other man's eye and not at his hand, will, even as it were, read in his eye where he purposeth to smite next, for the eye is nothing else but a certain window for wit to shoot out her head at. This wonderful work of God in making all the members so obedient to the eye, is a pleasant thing to remember and look upon: therefore an archer may be sure in learning to look at his mark when he is young, always to shoot straight. . . . If a man would leave to look at his shaft, and learn to look at his mark, he may use this way which a good shooter told me once that he did. Let him take his bow on the night, and shoot at two lights, and there he shall be compelled to look always at his mark, and never at his shaft: this thing once or twice used will cause him forsake looking at his shaft. Thus Philologus, to shoot straight is the least mastery of all, if a man order himself thereafter in his youth . . . except the fault be only in your own self, which may come two ways, either in having a faint heart or courage, or else in suffering yourself overmuch to be led with affection: if a man's mind fail him, the body which is ruled by the mind, can never do his duty; if lack of courage were not, men might do more masteries than they do, as doth appear in leaping and vaulting. All affections (i.e. passions) and especially anger hurteth the mind and body. The mind is blind thereby: and if the mind be blind, it cannot rule the body aright.

How finely suggestive and true are these remarks in our moral and religious life. How else, indeed, can we keep straight except by keeping our mind's eye always fixed on the mark, on the good, the true, the beautiful, and that we can learn best to do even at those times which we speak of as dark, when our way is hid, when we must perforce only have the mark before our eyes—the kindly light.

We have incidentally such interesting glimpses of men and manners as the following: speaking of the need that studious men should take exercise and recommending archery, Ascham refers to that famous contemporary of his, and Reformer, Erasmus.

Thus pastimes for the mind only, be not fit for students, because the body which is most hurt by study, should take away no profit thereat. This knew Erasmus very well, when he was here in Cambridge; which when he had been sore at his book (as Garret our book-binder hath very oft told me) for lack of better exercise would take his horse, and ride about the market hill, and come again.

These are but glimpses of a great little book which was to contribute not a little to the moulding of the type of men who were to make of Elizabeth's reign our Augustan Age, the Golden Age of great scholars and great soldiers, of men at one and the same time scholars and soldiers. When Shakespeare wishes to express a fine and noble gentleman worthy of Portia's love, for instance, he speaks of Bassanio as a scholar and a soldier—knowledge and arms, wisdom and courage, scholarship and soldiership, the Booke and the Bowe. In the dedication of the book to the King, Roger Ascham says that it was the intention of the little treatise, "that Labour, Honest pastime and Virtue might recover again that place and right, that Idleness, Unthrifty gaming and Vice hath put them from." It was to be a token of his love and duty towards the King, and also a sign of his good mind and zeal toward his country. The book is studded with great and good things from his wide reading in the classics, and not least from the Bible. Not altogether inappropriately might the words in Samuel be applied to the King and Ascham—"And he bade them teach the children of Judah the song of the bow: behold it is written in the book of the Upright." At Ascham's death Elizabeth said she would rather have lost £10,000 than her tutor Ascham—that was probably the Queen's way of saying he was worth his weight in gold. And the Dean of St. Paul's testified that he never saw or heard of a person of greater integrity of life. Yes, "Toxophilus" is "the book of the Upright."

When archery had arrived at its perfection it was suddenly superseded by firearms in a very undeveloped condition. God grant that now that firearms have arrived at their perfection they may as suddenly be superseded by arbitration in however undeveloped a condition. For warfare has become mere blind butchery. The very friendliness and courtesy of the "enemies" on the battle-fields reveal what a ghastly anachronism bloodshed has become. May the bomb-shells, 80-ton guns, and gunpowder as completely vanish from existence as the sling and the bow and the arrow have done, and may only the armour of the Prince of Peace be shortly worn. May we "put on" Christ—having girded our loins with truth, and having put on the breast-plate of righteousness, and having shod our feet with the preparations of the glad tidings of Peace. Roger Ascham's "Toxophilus" is a sign and a symbol that the unexpected may happen, and that the "impossible" is possible. E. L. H. THOMAS.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR,—I crave leave for one more word in view of the immense importance to our national life of a correct understanding of some of the causes which have led to this deplorable conflict.

Mr. Shield claims that the Naturalisation Law passed by the Transvaal Government in July last was not a reasonable concession, and he appeals to a "competent authority" who describes it as beset and hedged round with irritating and impossible conditions. I turn to the page in the Blue Book to which he refers me, and find that his "competent authority" is an unsigned article in the Transvaal Leader—a Johannesburg paper, the property of the financial clique there. (See Mr. J. A. Hobson's articles in the Speaker and the Contemporary Review.) Of the spirit in which this "competent authority" discharges its task, your readers may judge from the following extract which I cull from the examination of this new Law:—

> The frantic efforts of the President and his advisers—including, of course, the Free State, the Cape Ministers, and the Afrikander Bond—to manufacture a Reform Bill which will confer in reality nothing, whilst clothed with a specious pretence of generosity, have now reached a point which would provide a very effective situation in comic opera, but which certainly makes the judicious grieve.

I have other extracts from the Leader, with which I will not ask you to disfigure your pages, but which are at Mr. Shield's service if he wishes to see them.

Briefly, what is the Law to which such epithets are given?

Every white male stranger who has reached the age of sixteen years, and who settles or has settled in the South African Republic, shall in future be able to obtain—

(1) Letters of naturalisation, provided that he gives six months' notice before the end of two years, and

(2) Full franchise, if he gives six months' notice before the expiration of five years' after naturalisation.

(3) Such notices to be accompanied by certificate from the field cornet or landrost, either stating their own knowledge or on the production of affidavits of two enfranchised burghers that the applicant shall have been domiciled in the Republic during the time named, and during that time shall have obeyed the laws of the land and committed no crime against the independence of the South African Republic.

(4) The applicant shall produce proof that he possesses unmortgaged fixed property to the value of £150, or pays rent to the amount of £50 per year, or draws a fixed salary or wage of £100, or makes an independent living by farming or cattle breeding.

The remainder of the Act merely provides machinery for carrying into effect the above stipulations.

Anyone who knows the conditions of life in the Transvaal must see that these provisions would in time admit every new comer who really desired to make the place a home. The clause about unmortgaged property is evidently not intended to exclude any possessed of fixed property above that value to any extent, and probably has not been worded carefully enough. The only doubtful clause to my mind is the possible interpretation which might be put upon the words "committed any crime against the independence of the Republic"; but what country in the world is there that would admit among its citizens those who had so committed offences against its integrity and independence?

The condition attached to the offer of the Transvaal Government on Aug. 19 and 21 only involved the dropping of the discussion as to the suzerainty, and the declaration on the part of the British Government not to further interfere in their internal affairs. (See W. Conyngham Greene's conversation, C. 9521, p. 45.) The Transvaal Government explained that they neither asked nor intended by this latter stipulation that the British Government should abandon any right which it might have either under the Convention or by international law for the defence of its own subjects (C. 9521, p. 53). Mr. Chamberlain stated in the House of Commons (Oct. 19, 1899) that the Government accepted nine-tenths of these conditions. Mr. Shield says they were "rejected, but not discourteously."

[Our correspondent here gives examples of Mr. Chamberlain's courtesy, which we omit, to economise space.—ED. INQ.]

I regret with Mr. Shield that President Kruger and his advisers did not accept the Government despatch of Sept. 8, but there was no promise of finality about this despatch, and it was hardly to be expected that, tricked as they believed themselves to have been, they could be expected to at once renew their offer of settlement without any of the quid pro quo they had asked for.

This letter has already extended longer than I wished, but I must deal with Mr. Shield's last two paragraphs.

I did not deny the "religious name to Colonists of the Episcopalian, Wesleyan, and Congregational denominations," but I did and do deny the name of religious to the opinions I have read as proceeding from many ministers to whom I understood Mr. Shield especially to refer, and which seemed to me to be totally devoid of the spirit which I have hitherto associated with any worthy definition of the word "religion." I suppose Mr. Shield will be prepared to admit that because an ecclesiastical official, however high, declares his opinion on matters of science, politics, art, sociology, it does not thereby become a "religious opinion." Take the memorial of the Natal Congregationalists which he quotes; they adduce no evidence in favour of their statement, and all the evidence I can find on the matter distinctly disproves the statement that the Republics made any enormous military preparations before the year of the conspiracy which culminated in the Jameson Raid. (I shall be glad to furnish Mr. Shield with such evidence as I have; it is too detailed for your columns.)

Are we to take this statement as a "religious opinion," or rather as a prejudiced and unfounded opinion? We gladly accept facts and information from men "on the spot," who are competent to give it; but sometimes those at a distance are able better to appreciate the true bearings and proportions of one fact to another rather than those caught up in the strong antipathies which have been caused by recent events in South Africa.

I write these words, Sir, in no pleasure of controversy. I would I could believe my country right, but allegiance to what I feel to be the truth compels me to acknowledge the painful conviction that this war is an unjust one—that it could with any display of common courtesy and good feeling have been avoided; and that while there are faults on both sides, the heaviest lie on the side of the country who, in happier days, extended her helping hand to struggling Republics and homes of free men, and will not, I believe, even now willingly strangle the independent political life of the Republics of South Africa.

RICHARD ROBINSON.

SIR,—I have this morning received a circular asking me to add my name to a list of honoured signatures appended to a letter addressed to Lord Salisbury on the subject of concluding the war in South Africa. Will you allow me to explain why I cannot sign this letter, and why I hope my brother ministers will, at present, refrain from doing so?

My reason is that the letter omits all reference to the necessity of securing disarmament in South Africa. It would leave the Boers with all their present rights intact to make an arsenal of the Transvaal, and with their power at short notice to hurl a large army, equipped with modern artillery, across the frontiers of our two colonies. Do those who have already signed the letter propose to leave these colonies defenceless against another such invasion, or do they wish to see our colonies armed like the Transvaal, and South Africa subject to a burden of armaments similar to that which oppresses European nations?

Through four long years the Northern States of America fought to put down the Southern secession, because in that way only could future war be rendered impossible throughout the Union; and we, I believe, should be doing "the Devil's own work" if we stopped before we had succeeded in rendering future wars equally impossible throughout South Africa. To think that this can be done by repeating the policy adopted in 1881 is, surely, preposterous.

I have carefully read Bryce's "South Africa," and a good deal else on both sides of the question, and I would not for a moment defend all our policy and diplomacy previous to the present deplorable state of things. But our faults seem to me as the small dust of the balance compared with the crime committed by the Boer oligarchy when they precipitated war rather than accept the terms in the Despatch of Sept. 8, or allow any more English soldiers to be landed in our own colonies. In order to secure a military advantage they committed one of the most wicked acts recorded in history; and, reckoning up the awful cost in death and suffering already incurred, I am amazed that we should be asked to urge the conclusion of the war without securing conditions which will render its recurrence impossible. It is not to secure such a "lame and impotent conclusion" that our volunteers are pressing to the front, and that Canada, Australia, and New Zealand are hurrying to the assistance of Cape Colony and Natal with an enthusiasm which has practically solved the problem of the Federation of the British Empire.

"THE WAR—FROM A HIGHER POINT OF VIEW."

SIR,—I have failed to discover the "element of consolation," which Mr. Vance offers us in his letter on "The War—from a Higher Point of View," in this week's issue of THE INQUIRER. I would venture to suggest, in the first place, that his description of the qualities brought forth by the influence of this war in the human beings concerned in it, is one-sided. I do not deny that we see numberless instances of self-devotion, of sympathy for ruined homes and broken hearts, and proofs of the unity underlying our own nation and her colonies which this crisis has awakened. But he does not mention the mad and brutal passions let loose upon the battlefield, which must make every engagement a hell; or the lust for conquest, the inflated pride in national prestige, and the love of war for its own sake, which it is plain to see (if only in the enormous output of cheap war literature) has been awakened in the minds of multitudes in our own country. Neither, it seems to me, does he take into consideration the feelings of enmity and distrust on the part of Boer for Briton and Briton for Boer — feelings which must, should our arms be victorious, rankle for years to come in the memories of those over whom we have gained the mastery. I would suggest that when we take into consideration all the emotions awakened in men's minds by the war, the argument of the preacher, mentioned by Mr. Vance, falls to the ground.

Further, Mr. Vance speaks of the "hideous" slaughter of man by his brother man, and of the "terrible" carnage recorded in the annals of human history, yet he would have us believe that because the uninterrupted sweep of natural law brings, at times, death and ruin among men, and because in the animal world, it seems ordained that the weak, through conquest, shall give place to the strong, therefore we may suppose that bloodshed and carnage among men are of little significance in the sight of God. Men must be subject to earthquake, famine, and flood if the forces of Nature never swerve, and surely it is wholly a blessing to know that in the physical world effect always follows cause. Then, again, does not the highest teaching of the present day tell us that God is bringing out His great purposes through the slow process of evolution—that man evolved from a lower stage of development through the struggle for existence is to outgrow now his brute inheritance, that as Professor Fiske says, in the course of ages, "War and all forms of strife will slowly die out, and a stage of civilisation will be reached, in which human sympathy shall be all in all, and the spirit of Christ reign supreme throughout the length and breadth of the earth."

If this be so, then war is a retrograde movement. Who can suppose the slaughter of our fellow-men is the outcome of our disinterested love for him? Numbers of persons who look upon war as a necessity of our imperfect civilisation, and do not attempt to reconcile it with the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount, excuse it on the plea that our Empire "cannot be run on Christian principles!"

Notwithstanding our blunders and imperfections God's purposes march on; but are we not meant to work for, and help on, the end which He has had in view from the beginning? I cannot see how, under present circumstances, we, as a nation, can "feel perfect confidence of being justified in God's sight."

FRANCES E. COOKE.

THE IMPORTANCE OF PERSONALITY.

SIR,—Mr. Hawkes's letter opens up such a fascinating and fruitful field for discussion that it is with extreme reluctance I constrain myself to be brief.

My point was not, as he seems to assume, that teaching is in no circumstances an expression of personality, but that it is necessarily an incomplete expression. Cold print and Greek manuscripts do in a measure convey personality. I have a fairly distinct knowledge of the personality of Oliver Wendell Holmes, but I never met him in the flesh; I have not even read his biography. Again, I obtain a tolerably good acquaintance with the personality of Socrates simply through reading Xenophon's Memorabilia and Plato's dialogues. Harnack was quoted because, as Mr. Hawkes must have seen, the quotation is not a moral or spiritual truth such as I conceive to be "comparatively impotent" [N.B. the adverb.] apart from personality, but just one of those intellectual judgments of a distinguished critic that have weight by reason of the critic's eminence qua critic. Granted, at once, that the psalms and similar devout outpourings have profound influence upon us altogether unaffected by the necessary conception we form of their authors' personalities, but—and this is the point—would that influence be greater or less had we so distinct a knowledge of their personal lives as we have of the life of Jesus?

I agree that sensible and material vision helps us to realise spiritual truth, quickens the vividness of our conception of a man's personality and heightens the power of his "magnetism" over us. That is at once the justification and the peril of Ritualism of which Mr. Hawkes would probably shudder to find himself stand accused! But he goes further. He prepares a way in the wilderness for a fairly complete theory of the Church. If the power of personality were essentially dependent upon flesh, blood and bones, and outward organisation, then we should find the Personality of Christ primarily where we do as a matter of fact in some degree find it, namely, in that continuous organic body of Christian discipleship which preceded the historical records, gave rise to them, and might conceivably have continued without them, and which has since developed to remain alive unto this day. We may, therefore, truly find the Personality of Christ to-day enshrined in the hearts of those who love our Lord and live in his spirit. Thus "the Church" is not, as the teachers at Pusey House do vainly imagine, "the perpetuation of the Incarnation"—for the human race is that. The Christian Church is the perpetuation of the Personality of Christ. By the aid of this thought, which I commend to the reader in the hope that he will fully work it out, the New Reformation may perhaps be enabled to rectify the defects of the old, in which, as the late Professor William Wallace neatly put it, "the title deed became more important than the estate."

But possibly Mr. Hawkes will now be eager to urge that knowledge of even human personality must not be thus materialised into a mere knowledge of the visible organism in which it dwells. When human spirit communes with human spirit, is the communion all a matter of touch and speech and gesture? I hardly think any man who knows what true friendship or love is will say so. When two friends are silent and motionless because of the exceeding eloquence of their hearts, is there no mystic mingling of souls? I know not, and in the present state of psychological knowledge probably no one else knows, whether to call this communion personal or impersonal; but I know this, that it is real—real as the grasp of a hand in the daylight. Now, if "God is the place of souls," what barriers can death raise against a believer in individual immortality other than material barriers? If God "is present with us, invisible it is true, but truly," may not that glorious company of the immortal dead be present too in Him—"for all live unto Him"? What pray we for when we say, "Take now the veil from every heart: and join us in one communion with thy prophets and saints who have trusted in thee, and were not ashamed"? It seems to me, therefore, infinitely nearer the truth of things to regard Jesus as the living Christ, which Mr. Stopford Brooke frankly does in "God and Christ" without, of course, "conceding his deity," than to look upon the gracious figure of our Master as merely the cold and chiselled statue of a dead prophet. Let us get rid once and for all of those twin bogies "present" and "absent"—they have little or no meaning for spiritual life—and take to heart the wise counsel of Mrs. Humphry Ward in her too long neglected Essex Hall lecture: "Learn to apply the old Catholic recipe of 'meditation' in new ways; and the disciple of to-day may yet feel his 'heart burn within him' as the Master draws near, to become not a passing guest, but the undying friend and pattern of the soul." J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me through the medium of your columns to draw the attention of your readers to the annually decreasing list of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association subscriptions, owing to the death of valued supporters.

In 1899 we lost a yearly sum of £46 3s. 6d. through deaths, and already for 1900 we have lost £160 14s. These sums have not by a very long way been made good by the addition of fresh subscribers to our list or by the increase of old subscriptions, though in some cases relatives of former subscribers have continued the subscriptions. The collections on Association Sunday are annually increasing, showing that the interest taken in the work of the Association throughout the country generally is not in any way diminishing. I feel very strongly that numbers of our friends would subscribe if they had the necessity brought home to them. We wish our Association to be in the future as it has been in the past, thoroughly representative of the activity and missionary zeal of Unitarians, and the only way to ensure this is for Unitarians everywhere to subscribe according to their means. Anyone wishing detailed information about the work of the Association will have a report and other literature forwarded on application to the Secretary at Essex Hall. I need hardly add that I shall be glad to receive and acknowledge any new or increased subscriptions.

THE NEW REFORMATION.

SIR,—In a recent number of THE INQUIRER, the following words of Mrs. Humphry Ward are quoted:—

What if in each town the small and simple beginnings of a new Broad Church Union could be established? What if the foundations of a lay study of Christian dogma and Christian history, a veritable "new learning," fraught with no less momentous consequences for practical Christian life and organisation than the "new learning" of Colet and Erasmus was for the life of the sixteenth century, could be slowly and steadily laid throughout the kingdom? Let a few people in each large town, in each congregation, try and establish such a union.

A most excellent and fruitful suggestion; but who will take it up? It is hopeless to look to the "Church" to do it. But why should it not be attempted in places where a Unitarian congregation forms a centre of liberal religious thought and action? Why should not such unions be organised for the free and reverent discussion of the intensely interesting questions connected with modern liberal thought which in religion, in ethics, in philosophy are agitating the minds and consciences of so many to-day? What a help it would prove to many who are in a state of religious distraction, to many who are in the border-land between the old and the new, and who imagine there is no firm resting place between orthodoxy and atheism. Such conferences well conducted, to which people of all denominations were invited, and which might meet either on a week-day evening, or, better still, on a Sunday afternoon or evening, might do a good work in helping on the "New Reformation." P. E. VIZARD.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

SIR,—May I be allowed, in forwarding you a copy of the appeal which is being sent out in the Manchester District to all the members of our churches whose addresses we can obtain, to thank those who have already responded? These are mostly the donors and subscribers of the larger amounts, and, naturally, few in number. May I express the hope that some thousand or more replies will soon be coming in from the donors and subscribers of the smaller amounts? It is earnestly desired that the Domestic Missions should receive such support as will show that a real interest is being taken in its work by all the members of our churches. May I further ask Manchester friends to reserve Tuesday, March 27, for the annual meeting of the Society, in the Lord Mayor's parlour at 3 P.M., and also call attention to Mr. J. H. Leigh's reading of Hamlet, in aid of the Mission Funds, on Feb. 28, of which fuller notice will be found in the advertisement.

WILFRED HARRIS (Hon. Sec.)

OBITUARY.

CHARLES FREDERIC STEVENS.

DURING the service at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, last Sunday evening, there passed away to his higher home one of the oldest and most respected members of the congregation—Mr. Frederic Stevens. The announcement was made during the devotional part of the service, and as a tribute to his memory, the congregation separated before the sermon. Mr. Stevens was in his eighty-second year, having been born on May 27, 1818. During the whole of his long life he was attached to the chapel, and even to the last was found together with his devoted wife three times every Sunday in his accustomed seat just beneath the pulpit. He was a teacher in and a superintendent of the Sunday-school for a period of about sixty years. On his retirement from the office of superintendent, he was presented with an illuminated address and an album containing the portraits of the teachers of the school, beginning with those of Dr. Martineau, John Withers Dowson, and James Nasmyth Mottram, who founded the school in 1822. He was also chairman and senior trustee of the Presbyterian Higher Grade School. By trade he was a tinware manufacturer. Being of a studious disposition, he used to rise in his early days at four o'clock every morning, in order that his reading might not interfere with his business. In the various phases of theological thought, in the passing events of the day, in the revelations of science and religion, and in the disputations of political leaders, he was deeply interested. In politics he was an ardent Liberal. So greatly was he respected in the parish where he lived that in spite of his Unitarian views he was elected churchwarden, which office he fulfilled with considerable tact and ability for many years. In order to gain more experience in his craft he spent a few years in London, and whilst there attended the services at South Place Chapel, then conducted by the Rev. W. J. Fox. From these services he reaped great pleasure and benefit, and he delighted to speak of the satisfaction each return of the Sunday afforded him, when he could get to hear Mr. Fox preach. His first wife was Miss Crane, by whom he had three sons and a daughter, who are still living. His second wife, who survives him, was Miss Starling, with whom he has spent thirty-three years of uninterrupted happiness. He was never heard to speak disparagingly of anyone, and by a quick but gentle turn in the conversation invariably checked any tendency in that direction in others. He was always cheerful and alive to every interest around him. He enjoyed a passage of wit and humour and had always ready an apt and pleasant retort. His intense love of the true, the beautiful and the good was of great helpfulness to all his friends, and the way in which he kept his youthful freshness and enthusiasm to the end was extraordinary. His memory, too, was wonderfully retentive, and if one were at a loss for the date of an ordinary event, which no one else thought of retaining, he had only to go to Mr. Stevens to find he had got it safely fixed in his memory. His influence for good was intense in the circle in which he moved and his power of uplifting the young was constantly testified by the many ways in which his old scholars showed their gratitude for his help, when engaged in the battle of life in foreign ands or many miles from home. He was always desirous of attending the gatherings at Whitsuntide and often took part in the discussions on the papers read. He was a well-known figure at the Triennial Conferences, and was looking forward to attending the coming one at Leicester as the great event of the year. He will be much missed at the Octagon for many years to come.

WILLIAM HORACE STEVENS.

WE have also to record the death of Mr. Horace Stevens, a nephew of the above, at the age of 54, which took place on the 13th inst. after several weeks' illness. He was well known in Norwich and was esteemed by all for his personal worth, kindly disposition, and unassuming manner. For many years he was honourably associated with local journalism, having been chief reporter on the Norwich Mercury, where he enjoyed the respect of all his colleagues. He was a devoted adherent of the Octagon Chapel, of which he was an active secretary for some years. He was also keenly interested in Freemasonry, being a Past Master of Walpole Lodge and Past Assistant Grand Director of Ceremonies of Provincial Grand Lodge. He was also a Past Principal of Perseverance Chapter of Royal Arch Masons and of Rose Croix Clarence Chapter, and was a member of the Knight Templars. He leaves a widow, two sons, and three daughters, who have the sympathy of a wide circle of friends.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Martineau's "Loss and Gain in Recent Theology."

THE devout trusts and habits of the soul in which the pure religious life consists are conscious of their own conditions, and ask no help from sense or fancy. "Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed"; who knowing that "spiritual things are spiritually discerned," pined for no brilliant phantasms, but can "pour forth their song in the night," and to whose thought and love, just as to God himself, "the darkness shineth as the light." What is Divine in the world and in ourselves is precisely what lives behind and within all appearances; and the assurance of it becomes intense in proportion as outward conditions dissolve like shadows before us, and leave us alone at the inner focus of reality. It is with closed eyes that we best commune with the Father of spirits, and "enter the secret place of the Most High." None the less solemnly does Conscience make us "sure that our sins will find us out," because we have no vision of the hour and the scene of our inevitable shame. And when death snatches from our side the attendant angels of our life, guides and companions of our way, with their wisdom not half exhausted and the wonders of their love only just begun, are we not as certain that they are made for more than these fragmentary years, as if the landscape were before us of the everlasting hills? For my part, I put no faith in scenic religion, and look upon the modern ritualistic return to it as an unfailing mark of inward decay. It is a puerility, or a mockery, to offer it as help in temptation or peace in sorrow. If the immediate pleading of God in our conscience is of no avail, the visionary fires of future torment will glare upon us in vain. And as for our dear departed ones, if we cannot surrender them to the environing infinitude as to the protecting arms of God, it will hardly be more congenial to let them go into any pearl-gated City of the Redeemed. The closer we keep to the simplicity of human life, the meanings of human experience, the depth of human duty and affections, the nearer shall we stand to God as well as man, and the less, from our station on earth, feel ourselves cut off from heaven. In youth, if ever we receive a "Serious Call," it is the most elementary religious truths by which the mind becomes entranced. Who can ever forget the intense and lofty years when first the real communion of the Living God—the God that received the cries of Gethsemane and Calvary—and the Sanctity of the inward Law, and the sublime contents of life on both sides of death, broke in a flood of glory upon his mind, and spread the world before him, stripped of his surface-illusions and with its diviner essence cleared? The restless intellect of mid-life may toss these things about in speculation, may add to them or take from them, or weave them into the artificial texture of a system. But in old age, as the end draws near, we repose again on these simple truths and trusts, only with a fuller inward witness and more spiritual calm. And so, the evening light is as the morning's, and sheds once more the tenderest beauty on the world.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Forgive us our Trespasses."

IN the prayer for daily bread we ask of God, our Father, that we may never forget that He is the giver of all the good and beautiful gifts of our life, and that what we have to do in gaining those gifts must be honestly and thankfully done. But then we remember how often we have done what we ought not to have done, how much there has been that was wrong in our lives, so that when we think of what is the will of our Father, and how His children ought to live, we are restless and ashamed, and must ask to be forgiven. So after the prayer for daily bread we say, "Forgive us our trespasses."

The word trespass means going across a boundary line onto forbidden ground. In the country when you come to a gate leading into a field or along a road, if there is a notice up about trespassers, you know you must not go there. And so the word is used for all that we do, which we know we ought not to do; it is a trespass, it is crossing over from the right to the wrong; and when we pray "Forgive us our trespasses," it is the same as saying "Forgive all the wrong we have done."

It is one of the great needs of our life, quite as much as daily bread, to ask and to receive our Father's forgiveness for the wrong we have done. Think what it means. God is always with us, and it is He who gives us that wonderful feeling of the difference between right and wrong, so that we are miserable when we have done wrong, and know that we ought to have done the right. So our Father speaks to us in conscience, without any words; and we cannot be at peace again until we have given up the wrong, and have confessed it to Him, ashamed of ourselves, hating the evil, and longing with our whole heart to be more brave and faithful to what we know is right.

But then we are brought back to quietness of heart and happiness in the thought that our Father knows, and because we are repentant, forgives us and will help us to be more true to Him and to our own better self. He forgives us because He is our Father, who loves us always, and is glad when we honestly repent, and try with all our strength to do better.

When we ask in this way to be forgiven, it is not from any cowardly wish to escape the punishment which we know we have deserved, but because we are truly ashamed and sorry, and because we know that we can only have real happiness by loving and doing the right and so being at peace with our Father.

Jesus told the story of the Prodigal Son to help people to understand that and to be sure that God was always ready to forgive. The younger son in that story, when he had wasted all that his father had given him in selfish and shameful pleasures, "came to himself," and he went home and confessed, "Father, I am no more worthy to be called thy son." He could not ask to be taken back, as though nothing had happened; and when his father, seeing the honest shame and sorrow in his face, received him with joy, we may be sure that the son was more humbled even than before, and that the thought of his father's forgiving love would be to him a stronger guard against temptation and a stronger power to make him brave and faithful to do right than anything else could have been.

Every child growing up in a good home knows the power of forgiveness and love like that. Having once done wrong and been forgiven, and seeing what it is to father and mother, it is not fear of punishment that keeps you from doing wrong again, but the remembrance of the look of pain and sorrow in their faces. It is like a scorching fire in the heart, to burn out all the evil selfishness and compel you to love and do what is right.

It is a far happier and nobler thing to do the right simply because it is right, rather than from fear of punishment, and those who help us to love the right as Jesus did, as all our best friends and teachers do, help us far more than those who do nothing but threaten punishments.

Some boys were staying once in the country for a holiday, and without thinking that they were doing any harm, they carelessly trampled down the side of a field where the young corn was growing up. Before they had climbed the fence on the other side the owner of the field came up and saw what they had done. If he had been a passionate man he would have thrashed them for the damage they had done, and would have warned them with angry words never to come near his fields again. But this man, after he had asked them some questions, to find out what boys they were, showed them how they had damaged the corn, and then pointed out to them some other fields where they might ramble about as much as they liked, and could do no harm so long as they did not break down the fences. You may be sure, after his kindness and gentleness, those boys would be very careful not to trespass again where they ought not to go, and would be specially eager not to damage anything on his land. But if he had been passionate and rough with them it very likely would have wakened a bad spirit in them, they would have kept out of his way in fear, but would have been glad to do some more mischief if they could without being caught. That only shows how much stronger gentleness and love are to help us to do right, and there are many other stories, not only about children, but about grown-up people, which teach the same lesson.

Remember how it is in your own home, and then think of the great love of our heavenly Father, and his patience with us who so often do wrong. When we remember all that He gives us in the beautiful gifts of our life, in our homes, in all the love that cares for us, it must make us miserably ashamed of our disobedience and ingratitude; and as we ask to be forgiven, His love must be a mighty power in our hearts to keep us brave and true, and gentle and unselfish, as we know His children ought to be.

And, of course, we must be forgiving too! For how can we ask our Father to forgive us, when all the time there are angry and jealous and unforgiving feelings in our hearts? So the whole sentence of the prayer is "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." If we do not, our prayer is only a pretence. But if we do, then we know more perfectly than ever the happiness and the new strength that come to us from our Father's forgiving love.

A SACRED TRUST.

IT happened that at the close of the session in June, 1881, there were no students leaving Manchester New College, so that there was no occasion for the customary valedictory service in Little Portland-street Chapel, at which students who had completed their course received a farewell from the Principal, and a welcome into the ministry for which they had been trained. This gave an opportunity to Dr. MARTINEAU'S old students in the College, which they thankfully embraced. Forty-five of them, representing the students of forty years, joined in a request that there might be a special service held, on the usual evening of the valedictory service, at which they should once more be permitted to listen together to the voice from which they had learnt so much. To this request Dr. MARTINEAU acceded in an affectionate letter, and at the service, which was held in Little Portland-street Chapel, delivered the address on "Loss and Gain in Recent Theology," now included in the collected edition of his "Essays, Reviews, and Addresses."

Those who were present at the service will not forget the deep impression that it made; but the words spoken then have now a new depth of meaning, and appeal not only to those whose inestimable privilege it was to be students of his in College, but to all who have learnt of him, who have come within the circle of his gracious influence, and desire to be drawn more closely into the fellowship of that religious communion in which he ministered with such surpassing power.

In self-forgetfulness, Dr. MARTINEAU said at the end of his address, lies the secret of spiritual power; and this he found testified, as in all Christian history, so in his own experience, in the generations of students on which he looked back, and in the teachers and friends who had most profoundly affected him.

The forms that are still radiant, the eyes that have not lost their glow and are still as if near to us in the distant air, are those of loving and trustful disciples, surrendered to faithful service, and spending in it with childlike simplicity the gifts of genius or the affluence of culture. Your own hearts will testify that it is no mere personal accident if Channing, inspirer of my youth, and John James Tayler, the friend of my full age, live before me among the dearest and most sacred figures of my past, and of my future. It is their purity of soul, their constancy in duty, their tenderness of affection, their life in God, that joins them to the train of Christ, and mingles them with the lengthening procession of the saints. Their work is in your hands; may the grace and power of their spirit be continued in your hearts!

So he spoke nearly twenty years ago, and added the prayer at the conclusion of the service :—

"Rising above all proud thoughts and selfish aims and unloving temper, may we dedicate ourselves to Thee in the meekness and simplicity of CHRIST. Sanctify every soul that seeks Thee here; and send us to our remaining work with chastened desires, with truer diligence, and more devoted fidelity. Living or dying, here or there, still join us in love to each other and to Thee."

Into the hidden communion of the Household of GOD he now has passed, and as we remember his purity of soul, his constancy in duty, his tenderness of affection, his life in GOD, we must cherish the silent prayer that the grace and power of his spirit, in that great companionship, may be indeed continued in our hearts.

We have received from him a sacred trust—a trust determined by what GOD has given us in him. We are called to the service of religion, which is the highest service of our fellow-men, as it is the service of GOD, in the freedom of the Spirit; and he has been and is the chief of our teachers in these latter days, to give us strength to stand firmly on the true foundations, insight to understand the abiding things of the Spirit, and wisdom to enter with lowly discipleship into the mind of CHRIST. In that same address he spoke of the supreme place of religion in our human life :—

> Say what we may about the dissensions of Christendom, I yet affirm that Religion in its very essence, and the religion of Christ in the most absolute degree, is a bond of human union tenacious in itself, and increasing the tenacity of every other. It is always the self-assertion of intellect and will that divides us: it is the self-forgetfulness of love and reverence that unites us: and never can we so pass out of our own hands as when we lose ourselves in God: to be one with Him is to be one with each other. There are two sides to human life: one, towards the kingdom of nature; the other, towards the kingdom of God. To the former belong all the secular competitions, the strife of opinion, the self-regarding efforts, the passions of party, the conflicts of war, which keep the world in a ferment of ambitions, and make it the prize of victorious capacity. To the latter belong all the blending affections, the common admirations, the subduing pieties, the enthusiasms for the true, the just, the holy, by which life is sweetened and purified, and healing brought to its sorrows and peace to its storms. In the rivalry between the two, rude voices proclaim the triumph of the energies; but Christ steps forth and pronounces the beatitudes. That winning voice has brought you to his side. You have accepted from him a function which is not pre-occupied by the eager partizans of separate interest or opinion, not superseded by the journal or the platform—namely, to become the organ of faith deeper than opinion, of hope that is never clouded, of charity that conquers ill; to intensify the hunger and thirst after righteousness; to open the dull eye of the spirit to the beauty and graces hid beneath the plain face of life; and reverently watch over that purity of heart which alone can see God.

That is one of many passages in which he calls us to the true allegiance, in self-surrender, in the communion of the inward life with GOD; and it rests with us now to prove that he has not spoken in vain, and that through him GOD shall not speak to us in vain.

The appeal comes first to each individual life, for renewed consecration, for more faith in the living GOD and the unseen things of the spirit, for a fresh evidencing of the power of Christian discipleship; and it comes with added force to those of us who are gathered into the fellowship of the Free Churches, into which he was born and in which the service of his long life was dedicated to the end in faithful ministry. Writing of Dr. MARTINEAU in The Independent of Jan. 18, the Rev. W. GARRETT HORDER said: "I always feel that in much of his religious writing he lays foundations for a temple greater than those with whom he usually co-operated erect thereon." That undoubtedly is true; for he laid foundations for a temple greater than any actual Christian Church or community has yet erected, he laid the foundations of an ideal Church of the Spirit, catholic in its comprehensiveness and open to all the truth of GOD. "Those with whom he usually co-operated" do not wish to be alone in building that great temple, they have no desire to form a separate, sectarian body amid the Churches of the land, but so far as they have learnt of him, they desire an open religious fellowship, and their special calling is to keep their own Churches true to that ideal. "Those with whom he usually co-operated" are for the most part Unitarians who worship in Free Churches, and they must have faith in their freedom, and therein manifest the strength of a true inward life with GOD. It is open to them to maintain a Church life that shall be effectual in the most helpful Christian ministry, loyal to all truth, and at the same time, while preserving independence of character, in principle and actual temper ready for the widest religious fellowship.

What part in the life of this country our churches may be called to play in the coming century it is not ours to foresee; what we do know is that their strength must be in "the self-forgetfulness of love and reverence." Remembering what we possess in the inheritance of our last great teacher, as added wealth to the abounding riches of the Christian communion, we have no excuse for slackness or despondency, but every reason for thankful courage and strenuous faithfulness, untroubled for to-morrow while we do the duties of to-day.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

THE following memorial has been sent to the Prime Minister:—

To the Right Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury, K.G.

MY LORD MARQUIS,—We, the undersigned, being Ministers of Religion connected with Unitarian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing Churches, deeply deploring the present war in South Africa, and convinced that its prolongation must be destructive of those feelings of amity and goodwill between ourselves and our neighbours, which it has ever been the object of a wise statesmanship to foster and promote, would respectfully impress upon your Lordship our most earnest desire that the British Government should, at the earliest available opportunity—the integrity of British territory having been assured—by overtures for an Armistice or otherwise, prepare the way for negotiations with the Governments of the South African Republics with a view to ensure an effective and enduring peace on such terms that while justice shall be accorded to British subjects resident in the Transvaal, it shall be manifest to the world that the British Government is animated by no spirit of revenge, and seeks neither goldfields nor territory; but desires, above all things, relations of kindness and goodwill between the English and Dutch races in South Africa.—We are, my Lord Marquis, most respectfully,

LITERATURE.

JOHN CAIRD.*

I.—MEMOIR.

THE many admirers of Dr. John Caird's character and genius will rejoice that his Gifford Lectures, the second series of which abruptly terminated at the close of the eighth lecture, owing to the lecturer's break-down in health, were left in a state fit for publication. Though we have only twenty lectures out of the projected twenty-four, it is evident that these contain all his more important ideas on the subject discussed. It is a further matter for congratulation that the lectures are introduced by a Memoir of nearly 150 pages from the pen of the lecturer's equally distinguished brother. The reader cannot fail to be prepossessed by the excellent portrait facing the title-page, for it is clearly indicative of intellectual power, of moral purity, and of great sweetness of personal character.

As was to be expected from the mental characteristics of the Master of Balliol, the Memoir furnishes both a graphic picture of the chief features of Dr. John Caird's rather uneventful life, and also explains with great lucidity and fulness the principal phases in the development of his philosophical views. There is, however, one very important side of Dr. J. Caird's influence on the world which finds but scanty recognition and description in his brother's biographical sketch—namely, his relations with the various important movements in liberal religious thought which were going on among his contemporaries. For all we learn from Dr. E. Caird's Memoir, it would seem that in his opinion the advance in theological freedom and insight in Scotland during the last half-century was wholly, or very nearly, identical with the growing acceptance of the Hegelian philosophy of religion among the more thoughtful ministers. It is evident, however, from the recently published elaborate treatise by the Rev. James Lindsay, of Kilmarnock, on "Recent Advances in the Theistic Philosophy of Religion," that the movement of free religious thought in Scotland has been by no means confined to that line of "Absolute Idealism" in which the minds of the brothers Caird found such complete satisfaction; and that the writings of such eminent religious thinkers as Dr. James Martineau, F. W. Newman, and Miss Frances Power Cobbe were having no little effect upon the more thoughtful ministers and laymen on both sides of the Tweed.

We regret, accordingly, to learn from a statement at the opening of the Memoir that the materials in the way of correspondence that were at the biographer's disposal were but small; for it would naturally be in his letters to his more intimate friends that the great Glasgow preacher and professor would most freely unbosom himself in regard to his attitude and sympathies towards the other heretical or semi-heretical religious reformers of his time. But if such correspondence exists the present Memoir presents little or no trace of it. We are told, too, that in his capacity as Principal of the University Dr. Caird used to invite "leading ministers of the Church of Scotland, the Free Church, the United Presbyterian Church, and of other less important denominations" to occupy the University pulpit. Various distinguished clergymen of the Church of England, such as Jowett, Stanley, and the present Bishop of Ripon, also received and accepted the same invitation. It appears, therefore, that it was in the Principal's power, if he had thought fit, to have given the University the advantage of hearing such preachers as Dr. James Martineau and Mr. Stopford Brooke; and it would be most interesting to learn somewhat of the motives which limited his selection; for it is difficult to believe, after reading the Memoir and the Lectures, that Dr. John Caird can have seriously thought that he himself was a whit more "orthodox" than are the two influential preachers and thinkers just mentioned. It appears, however, that he had somehow persuaded himself, as Hegel did before him, that his idealist philosophy enabled him to grasp and appropriate the spirit, if not the letter, of the various dogmas which figure in the Westminster Confession. His brother Edward, however, is evidently sceptical as to this assumed wonderful efficacy of Hegelianism in rationalising and justifying the dogmas of orthodoxy; for he says in his quiet, cautious way:—

If my brother committed an error, it was rather that he followed Hegel in believing that the whole structure of dogma, as it has been developed by the Church, could be re-interpreted by philosophical reflection without any essential change.

* "The Fundamental Ideas of Christianity." By John Caird, D.D., LL.D., late Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Glasgow. With a Memoir by Edward Caird, D.C.L., LL.D., Master of Balliol. 2 vols. Glasgow: James MacLehose and Sons. 1899. 12s. net.

And in another place he significantly says :—

Perhaps John did not realise—I say this only to indicate a difference between us which was never completely settled in all our discussions—how great must be the transformation of the creed of Christendom, before, in the language of Goethe's well-known tale, the hut of the fisherman can be transformed into the altar of the great Temple of Humanity.

Dr. Caird's fundamental philosophical views would, moreover, inevitably lessen his intellectual sympathy with such a religious thinker as Dr. Martineau. In treating, for instance, of the general character of his brother's lectures as Professor of Divinity, Dr. E. Caird says :—

As to the matter of his teaching, it is obvious from the introductory lecture that he was greatly influenced by the idealistic philosophy. In fact, as he often maintained, it is in some form of that philosophy that one who would defend theology as a form of scientific knowledge, and not merely as a supernatural revelation, must find his weapons.

As students of "A Study of Religion" and "The Seat of Authority in Religion" well know, Dr. Martineau is pre-eminently a thinker who seeks to defend theology on rational grounds, and "not merely as a supernatural revelation"; but he is at the same time a philosopher who regards the idealistic armoury as one of the last places to which he would think of having recourse for his most effective weapons. Indeed, in his notable article in the Nineteenth Century on Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief," Dr. Martineau expresses in the most emphatic terms his inability to accept absolute idealism as a satisfactory philosophy of either ethics or religion.

For these and similar reasons we hold that it is very desirable to learn something of what Dr. J. Caird and his immediate disciples and friends thought about the two conflicting theologies which for the last twenty or thirty years have been respectively inviting the attention and adhesion of the more reflective ministers of religion both in England and Scotland. The very marked decline of Hegelian influence over the theologians and ministers of religion in Germany makes the question of Dr. Caird's influence over Scottish theological thought one of great interest and importance. It is evident that neither John Caird nor his biographer can, at least of late years, have imagined that the present stream of theological liberalism is flowing altogether in their direction. Hence while we regard the present Memoir as most valuable and indeed indispensable, we hope that its existence will not preclude the appearance in the near future of a more comprehensive biography of this gifted and high-minded man—a biography, we mean, which will throw more light upon the currents of religious thought in Scotland, and upon Dr. John Caird's personal influence upon, and personal attitude towards, the other eminent thinkers who, like himself, were seeking to rationalise and liberalise theology.

Though Dr. Caird's philosophy of religion was, as we have seen, very different from Dr. Martineau's, yet when we turn to the particular theological dogmas commonly called orthodox, and ask which one of these Dr. Caird, in his later years, held and Dr. Martineau did not hold, neither the Memoir nor the Lectures enable us to fix definitely upon a single one. The only expression in the Memoir which may seem to indicate an acceptance of one of the dogmas of the creeds is one that occurs more than once—namely, "the idea of unity with Christ," on which we are told he was particularly fond of dwelling in his sermons. But as to what this precisely means, and whether it refers solely to the historical Jesus of Nazareth or not, the Master of Balliol discreetly leaves us entirely in the dark. Many Christian theists see a certain true meaning in the statement of the Apostle, "Your life is hid with Christ in God," without at all associating these words with a triune conception of the Godhead. The consideration, however, of Dr. Caird's relation to orthodox Christianity, and of the question how far his philosophy succeeded, as he maintained it did, "in rendering the most mysterious doctrines of Christianity luminous," will be more in place when, in a second paper, we attempt an examination of the Lectures. We are not surprised when we read that in the earlier period of his ministerial life he was "frequently accused of Rationalism, of Socinianism, and even of darker heresies than these. . . . Gradually, however, in his later years such reports died away, as a result mainly of the great changes of opinion, within and without the Church, which he, among others, had a considerable share in causing."

We can only glance here at the successive stages of his useful and honourable, but by no means romantic, career—his successful ministry for two or three years at Lady Yester's Church in Edinburgh; then a removal to a country parish in Perthshire, mainly on the ground of health; his growing reputation as a preacher which led to his being invited to preach before the Queen at Craithie that striking sermon entitled, "Religion in Common Life," a sermon which Dean Stanley considered to be the greatest single sermon of the century. In Perthshire, where he remained eight years, he succeeded by dint of great effort in founding a much-needed "Girls' School of Industry," and here, as afterwards when Principal of Glasgow University, he gave clear evidence that his idealism in philosophy was conjoined with untiring energy and with great capacity for practical organisation. The intellectual fruits of this country ministry were gathered up into a volume of sermons of the highest excellence, which were written before he came under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy, and are regarded by some competent critics as superior to those he wrote at a later time. From Perthshire he removed to Glasgow to take charge of the Park Church—a church which exactly suited him, for it was not connected with any presbytery, and, says he, "I hate presbyteries." This removal to Glasgow took place in 1858, when he was thirty-eight years old. In 1862 he became connected with the University as Professor of Divinity; four years later his brother joined him as a co-professor, and the two brothers "remained in daily communication with each other for twenty-eight years." In due time followed his appointment as Principal; and the Memoir gives a vivid picture of his unwearied devotion to the duties of this high post, and of his successful efforts to create friendly feelings and hearty co-operation between the City and the University.

To turn now to his career as a great preacher, we find that in his case, as in that of almost all very successful preachers, great physical advantages of personal presence and of voice were conjoined with much mental power and spiritual faith and fervour. The Rev. Dr. Macmillan, of Greenock, who was a student in Edinburgh when John Caird was preaching there, thus describes his appearance in the pulpit :—

His eager, youthful face seemed shaded with thought; and his long black hair, brushed back from his forehead, lent a striking prophetic look to it. . . . Carefully composed and committed to memory as was his theme, he spoke as if with pure spontaneity the thoughts that arose within him at the moment. Profoundly impressed himself, his words rang out strong and fervent, emphasised by the most appropriate gestures. Standing back from the pulpit board, brushing his long hair from his forehead, his eye kindling with a dusky yet piercing light, he poured forth a succession of impassioned sentences which fairly carried you away. There was no pretence, no studied, unnatural effect, but the fire and rapture of native eloquence.

It is interesting to be told that "he eagerly studied the writings of Carlyle and Ruskin, the former of whom had a very deep influence on him. He was also greatly interested in the writings of Newman and Pusey, but he had no sympathy at any time with sacerdotalism, and still less with the tendency to make religion centre in the Sacraments."

His philosophical reputation rests upon his popularising of Hegel's religious philosophy in the fascinating treatise entitled "An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion," on his attractive account of Spinoza in Blackwood's "Philosophical Classics," and on this series of Gifford Lectures. His brother most admirably and truly characterises this aspect of Dr. Caird's mind when he says :—

As a thinker he had not perhaps the highest kind of originality, but he never simply repeated the ideas of others or uttered anything that he had not made his own. . . . And it was the ethical bearing of his principles that his mind seemed to grasp most firmly, and which he showed most resource in evolving and illustrating.

We cannot more fitly close our notice of this Memoir of a truly admirable and lovable man than in the words of his old colleague and friend, Sir William Gairdner :—

In all that he said, or thought, or did, Principal Caird was manifestly under the guidance of a higher spirit than that of most of us. He preached, and prayed, and lectured, and went about his work of ruling and administration under a very noble and exalted idea of duty. Thus he was able—nay, he felt obliged at times—to do and to say things that traversed the cherished views of other men. Yet he made no enemies, because every one was satisfied that he was doing his duty and no more.

THE UNITED BRETHREN.*

THE story of the union of the two main bodies of Protestant Dissent in England after the passing of the Toleration Act forms an interesting chapter in the history of Nonconformity. This movement for union has left a few enduring traces in the religious life of our denomination. The

* "A Record of the United Brethren of Devon and Cornwall." By the Rev. Priestley Prime. Rawson and Co., Manchester. 1s. 6d., post free, of the author, 18, Hooley Range, Heaton Moor.

Presbyterian College at Carmarthen, the "Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian Ministers and Congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire," which embodies the Union of Lancashire ministers formed in 1693, and the United Brethren of Cheshire (1691), and the body which has been variously known as "The United Brethren of Devon and Cornwall," the "Exeter Assembly," or latterly the "Assembly of the West of England Presbyterian Divines," are examples. It is a record of the latter association that Mr. Prime has here set forth at the request of the members, and he has done good service in preparing it. He tells us at the outset that this Assembly "is not and never was representative of the West of England, but only of Devon and Cornwall, other counties in the West having had their own Assemblies, without having been at any time incorporated with this; and that the Assembly is not and never was exclusively Presbyterian." It would be interesting to know when and how the present high sounding title was adopted. It does not seem at all unlikely that the ministers of Puritan sentiments in Devon should have acted together for certain purposes early in the seventeenth century as is stated by Jerom Murch, but of this Mr. Prime has found no evidence.

In accordance with the Parliamentary Ordinance for the establishment of Presbyterianism (1647), some attempt seems to have been made in Devonshire to organise the religious affairs of the county on the Presbyterian model, but this was abandoned in favour of an association of ministers similar to that organised by Baxter in Worcestershire in 1652. The ministers of the Gospel in the counties of Devon and Exon met in 1655, and subscribed their names to the constitution then agreed and resolved upon. Copies of the minutes of this Association, which existed from 1655 to 1659, are still extant, though the original records seem to have disappeared. Those Associations which followed the lines of Baxter's Worcestershire Agreement were open to all the county clergy, and the Devonshire Association was no exception if we may trust the account of its origin quoted by Murch from the Nonconformist Memorial.

About the same time (1653) Mr. George Hughes, then of Plymouth, and afterwards ejected from his living in that town, in conjunction with Mr. Thomas Ford, one of the preachers at the Exeter Cathedral . . . prevailed with the ministers of those parts, Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Congregational, to join in an association for mutual assistance in their ministry. They parcelled themselves into seven divisions, each met quarterly, and subdivided themselves into lesser bodies which met every six weeks. In their quarterly meetings the Moderator opened them with a Latin prayer; then there was a thesis upon some divinity question, and a disputation, wherein all the ministers present opposed the respondent.*

An examination of the names of those associating would show whether any Episcopalians belonged to this society. At the second general meeting a paper was handed in by "Brethren of the Congregational way," who evidently did not wish to be bound by subscription to those clauses of the Westminster Confession that dealt with matters of Church government. The terms of subscription were accordingly modified to accommodate the Congregational brethren, and they were admitted to the Association.

The neighbouring county of Cornwall associated on a similar plan. The minutes of "The Association of the Ministers of the Middle Division of Cornwall" are still extant, and range from Sept. 7, 1655, to May 5, 1659. This Cornish Association was reorganised, and a fresh agreement drawn up and subscribed by the ministers of the county "At a Generall Meetinge at Bodmin, Oct. 17, 1658." A minute of this meeting reads as follows:—"ffor the most conveniency of meetinge and proceedinge the ministers associated doe divide themselves into three particular associations—namely, the Easterne, ye Midle and Westerne. Botreaux Castle [i.e., Boscastle] and Low [i.e., Looe] inclusive East, Agnes Verrian [i.e., St. Agnes and St. Veryan] inclusive West—that betweene in the Midle."

As a matter of fact, the Presbyterians and Congregationals were drawn more closely together towards the close of the Commonwealth period than before; for example, amongst the papers of the Cross-street Chapel Trustees there is one containing "Propositions for Accommodation" between the two parties, which were agreed upon at Manchester in 1659. The associations started by Baxter paved the way for such agreements. From the time when they united in their address to the King (1672) the Lancashire Presbyterians and Congregationalists, says Halley, "acted together with uninterrupted harmony. . . . They kept private days together, occasionally united in sacramental communion, and even co-operated in ordination services. Indeed, Presbyterianism as an organised government of the Church by classes and synods was no longer practicable. Presbyterian congregations practically and necessarily in most particulars became independent, and if new jealousies had not been fomented and new controversies excited, the old distinction would long since have been obliterated and forgotten."* Much the same might be said of Nonconformity in Devonshire.

When Toleration was secured, the old ministerial associations were still remembered, and the way seemed open for a happy union. London led the way by effecting a union between the two great dissenting bodies in 1690. The "Heads of Agreement" were drawn up by John Howe, and printed in 1691.† The example was quickly followed in the country. The ministers of Devon met in March, 1691, and formed an association known as "The United Brethren of Exon and Devon," which has met regularly till the present time, though latterly under a different name. An agreement was drawn up, to which the members subscribed their names, which demanded godliness of life and soundness in the faith in those who joined them. It was hardly necessary to further specify "soundness in the faith," for there was a general doctrinal consensus amongst the Presbyterians and Independents. However, in June, 1691, the Assembly gave its assent to the Heads of Agreement of the London Brethren which were more explicit as to the doctrinal statements, to one or other of which subscription was required. In 1693 the Devonshire Brethren, says Mr. Prime, "ordered that a letter should be written inviting the Cornish ministers to join them, and from that time forward the title was "The United Brethren of Devon and Cornwall." We must take it, then, that the United Brethren of Cornwall did not maintain a separate organisation after that date. Similar associations of "United Brethren" are mentioned as existing in the neighbouring counties of Somerset and Dorset. Mr. Prime refers to the meeting at Bristol in 1694, in which a kind of federation of English Dissent was proposed, and a general correspondence between all the "United Ministers" of the Kingdom suggested. He does not mention the fact that James Forbes, of Gloucester, the Independent, who founded the Barton-street congregation in that city, was Moderator of this Assembly.

The proposals were sent to the various county associations. In the minutes of the United Brethren of Lancashire, the matter is referred to as follows under date Sept. 4, 1694:—

> The proposals for a general correspondence from the late Association at Bristol (Mr. Forbes, moderatour) was read and considered.
> We unanimously agree that a general correspondence of the United Brethren through this nation is highly expedient and desirable.
> We consent that the head of this correspondence be fixed at London.
> For the method in which this correspondence shall be settled, we leave the frameing of it to the Brethren at London, and shall wait for an account of what they conclude upon.

The London Brethren concluded upon nothing, because unhappy disputes quickly caused a breach amongst them in spite of an address sent up from Lancashire "humbly to advise and persuade them to a good accord, and to let fall their present controversie in order to it."

The Brethren of Devon and Cornwall ordained men to the ministry, arranged about supplying vacant pulpits, and gave advice to congregations who consulted them about appointing ministers. It was no doubt a considerable help to any Dissenting minister in Devon to have the countenance and gain the recognition of this Exeter Assembly. Thus the Assembly had a good deal of power. It made inquisition into the orthodoxy of ministerial candidates, and when the Arian controversy arose in the West it was strict in its requirement of a declaration of belief in Three Persons and One God from all candidates and ministers who settled in the district with the concurrence of the Assembly. This naturally led to heated disputes.

Mr. Prime shows the debilitating effect of those theological conflicts on the Assembly, and tells how this doctrinal restriction was happily done away with through the influence of Micaijah Towgood. After his settlement in Exeter, says Mr. Prime, "He soon began to liberalise the two congregations of which he was minister jointly with three other gentlemen, and in 1753 the Assembly was brought back to its rightful attitude towards differences of theological opinion." p. 30. We should rather say that owing to the influence of Towgood and others like him the Assembly was carried forward to a better attitude towards differences of theological opinion than it had ever taken up at any period in its previous history, and that this was one of the concurrent effects of the adoption by many members of the Assembly itself, of that broader Arian or Unitarian theology that was rapidly making its way amongst many of the old Protestant Dissenting congregations of England. We get a glimpse of the feeling of the Assembly on this matter in the "Family Records" of the Merivale family. Samuel Merivale, great grandfather of the late Dean of Ely, was ordained to the ministry at Tavistock in 1743. He had been educated under Doddridge, and seems to have been rather nervous about his examination by the Ministerial Brethren of Devon and Cornwall because his views as to the Trinity were "not so settled as I could wish." However, out of the seven examiners "only one," he says, "proposed any alteration in my article on the Trinity (which I had drawn up in Scripture words), and the rest spoke warmly against him." The liberal leaven was working even then.

The modern history of the United Brethren of Devon has not been at all exciting; had they adopted some such system of lay delegation as the amalgamated associations of United Brethren of Lancashire and Cheshire did in 1856 their society would not have degenerated into a kind of club whose members have an annual dinner at which the "Divines" divide their small but welcome fund according to rule.

We are grateful to Mr. Prime for this interesting "Record" carefully compiled, but we wish the members of the Assembly had authorised him to print their minutes and records in full, which would have been a great boon to students of Nonconformist history, and would have enabled comparisons to be made with the constitution and working of similar ministerial societies in other counties. Such an edition, well bound, with Mr. Prime's essay prefixed, would make a more useful and permanent volume. A paper-covered pamphlet like this invites destruction.

NOTES FROM EAST BENGAL.

Madras, Jan. 18, 1900.

THOUGH these Notes are written at Madras, they relate to a recent tour in East Bengal—Barisal, Dacca, Mymensingh. They do not refer to the meetings, because, if exigencies of space permit, you will no doubt utilise the newspaper reports which have been mailed to you. Barisal is a town of about twenty-three thousand inhabitants. The population consists of Hindus and Mahommedans, the former greatly preponderating. Europeans are "not in it." There are less than a dozen, all told; and most of these are connected with orthodox Christian missions. There is a Church of England—a commodious and handsome Gothic structure, but no resident clergyman. The services are conducted by a licensed lay-reader, who is familiar with the custom of reading to empty pews. There is a Baptist Mission, and some Baptist ladies conduct a Zenana movement. Orthodox Christianity has no hold on the people of Barisal. I am told that in the numerous villages comprised within what is known as the Barisal division there are six thousand "native Christians." But there, as elsewhere, they are all poor people who have been brought into nominal adhesion to orthodox Christianity by help given in times of need. "Native Christians," converted by this process, are known throughout India as "famine Christians," and when times of prosperity return many of them revert to Hinduism. To convert an educated Hindu is an achievement which rarely falls to the lot of the orthodox missionary. His successes are among those to whom he dispenses "loaves and fishes," and who eat and are filled.

In Barisal there is a large percentage of cultivated men, Hindus and Brahmos, who are, or have been, in the Government Service, in the legal and scholastic professions. Barisal is a busy town for lawyers. The people of the division are noted for their litigious disposition, and consequently there is a large "Bar," with District Judge, Deputy Judges, Assistant Judges, Munsiffs, Magistrates, and I know not what other legal functionaries. Not a few of these, with members of the Bar, attended the lectures in the Brahmo Somaj Hall; and with not a few of them I had personal interviews. All alike were deeply interested in religious questions, and especially in the philosophical aspects of theology. One of my visitors was an orthodox native Christian. After three hours conversation I am afraid he left me with the impression that I am a hardened old sinner beyond all possibility of salvation. But I became the more reconciled to his estimate of my evident irredeemability when I learned that he had quarrelled with the leaders of the "native Christians," and is now preaching on his own account as a "free and independent" gospeller.

A daily visitor has a highly-cultivated Mahommedan gentleman, holding an official position in Barisal, a man well read in English literature and in modern English philosophy, with the writings of John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Green, Caird, Sidgwick, Carlyle, John Morley, Frederic Harrison, and Leslie Stephen, at his fingers' ends. And this is the type of men whom your orthodox Christian missionary fails to touch, and who are described as "heathen." He was numbered among my hearers. He has a large and excellently selected library of Western literature, and at his request I gave him a list of recent publications which he had not seen. But to a lover of books it was grievous to see the damage done to his library by the damp climate of Bengal, costly editions becoming mouldy in spite of all care. Mr. Sen, now the District Judge of Mymensingh, told me that when, some years ago, he was away from home for a lengthened period, a collection of books which he highly valued, consisting of rare works and rare editions of works which he had specially brought from England, though in a closed case, were completely spoiled by damp and by white ants, pestiferous little creatures who are as much the enemies of books and clothes as mosquitoes are the enemies of man. A plague on these tormentors! But, alas! the plague is not on them, but, through them, on you and your things.

Barisal has High Schools and First Grade Colleges—that is, Colleges which prepare for the First Arts examination, practically the matriculation of Calcutta University. There are about two thousand collegiate students. Numbers of them came daily for conversation. I was struck by several prevailing characteristics. One was their intense appetite for English literature, and their desire for a "bill of fare," especially of the Elizabethan and Victorian periods. Another was their curiosity to know all I could tell them about modern London. Still another was the eager exclamation of nearly all, "How I wish I could go to England!" and then the pitiable sigh, "But it's a vain dream! We're too poor to cross the seas!" Even where poverty is not the deterrent, powerful, well-nigh omnipotent, social considerations are; for an English and European-travelled Brahmin is expelled from his family, degraded from his caste, shunned and left in isolation by his co-religionists, disinherited of his property; and he recovers his position only by undergoing a process of penance and purification. Yet instances are not wanting where English-returned Brahmins of wealth and influence have not been subjected to these penalties. Such is the deference to riches and to social status in the East as in the West.

Dacca is the most important town in Eastern Bengal. It is the capital of that division of the province. In fact, it is the second city in the Lower Provinces. It has many claims to be reckoned as the city next in importance to Calcutta. The "metropolis of India" is of modern growth; but Dacca was a centre of influence when Calcutta was unknown. Under the Mahommedan rule it was a focus of Moslem magnificence; but its once stately palaces and mosques and fortifications are now spectacles of desolation. "The Mahommedan quarter" is practically in ruins. At one time Armenians formed a numerous and powerful factor of the population; they were the wealthiest merchants, and most successful traders. For some reason or other which I could not discover, commercial blight fell upon them, they left the town, and now "the Armenian quarter," like its Mahommedan neighbour, is a silent and sad witness of decay. Dacca has been famous for its exquisitely fine cloth, but with the increasing demand for cheap goods, the manufacture of the old delicate and costly fabric has practically died out. Dacca is still famous for its plantains or bananas, which are of large size, juicy and luscious to the taste.

The present population of Dacca is about eighty thousand, and the modern parts of the town contain some handsome buildings and several palatial residences of Dacca merchants. A fine view of these is obtained from the river, on which, by-the-way, our Brahmo friends gave me a most enjoyable run in a very comfortable boat. The Brahmo Somaj Hall is a beautiful structure, the interior being well-finished and presenting an attractive appearance. It stands in a large "compound," which is well-planted with shrubs and flower-beds. Dacca is an important educational centre. Its student class numbers about six thousand. There is a Government College which prepares for the B.A. examination, and a Government High School which prepares for the Entrance examination, of the Calcutta University. There is also a Sanscrit College which teaches up to the B.A. requirements. Among the Professors in the Government College are several Brahmos, and the headmaster of the High School is a Brahmo. I came to know the Principal of the College, Mr. Munday, an Englishman, and with legitimate pride he congratulated himself on having persuaded the Government, after much importunity, to erect a recently-completed, large, and well-equipped laboratory. In connection with the High School there is an extensive playground, in which I was glad to see tennis-courts and some gymnastic apparatus. For cricket the students of Dacca have to go further afield—to a maidan a little way out of the town. Among my visits was one to the Eden Girls' School, which is practically under the management of Brahmos. It is held in a building of lofty and well-ventilated classrooms. The girls were bright, cheerful, and intelligent-looking. The elder ones were being prepared for the Entrance examination, and most of those who have been successful in the past have gone on to the Bethune Ladies' College at Calcutta, which prepares for the B.A. degree.

Of course, the girl-students in collegiate institutions in Calcutta and in Bengal, and in India generally, are an infinitesimal minority in the mass of the female population; but I am optimistic enough to think that the number of these will gradually grow, and that they will constitute the leaven which, in the course of time, will leaven the whole lump. In Vedic India women were not kept in ignorance or seclusion, and such education as men had was not denied to them. They were educated in the learning of the times, and occupied an honoured position in society. It was in a later period of Indian history—the age of the Sutras and the laws of Manu—there was a distinct decline in the position of women, until, about 1000 A.D., woman's subordination to man became complete. But the demand of justice that the same liberal education that is given to men should also be imparted to women is gradually making itself felt, and, in the march of time, women in India will be restored to their old position. In this emancipating and ennobling work our Brahmo friends have led the way.

I found the students of Dacca, like their fellows at Barisal, hungry and thirsty for English literature; ambitious of visiting Great Britain, especially to see London, Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh; eager to know the differences between University education in England and University education in India, as I had learned of the latter in Madras and Calcutta, and particularly to hear of residential University life in Oxford or Cambridge—a life, unhappily, unknown in University towns in India. Nothing would satisfy them but I must give them a lecture on this subject. The Brahmo Somaj Hall and its two spacious verandahs were crowded with students, and among them were many of their Professors. Their interests, however, are not confined to literature and to University training. Numbers of them are occupied and perplexed with theological questions, and many were the hours spent with them in discussing the problems that agitate them.

Among the friends I made at Dacca was Rai Kaliprosonno Ghosh Bahadoor—one of the most famous of Bengali scholars and writers, who received from the Government the title of Bahadoor on the expressly-stated ground of the literary excellence of his Bengali writings, and of the eminence he had deservedly gained as a native littérateur. A most gifted conversationalist, with a perfect command of finished English, he is deeply versed in Western liberal religious literature, an ardent admirer of the works of Martineau, Miss Cobbe, F. W. Newman, Theodore Parker, and Stopford Brooke. He is a member of the Psychical Research Society, and he strenuously maintains that the investigations of that Society have demonstrated immortality as a fact.

Mymensingh is a quiet town of about 8,000 inhabitants. Quiet, except in its law courts where conflicts are the order of the day. The good folk of the Mymensingh district, I was informed, are even more given to litigation that their countrymen of Barisal. The "Bar" does a thriving if not a very lucrative business. There is a branch of the school department of the City College, Calcutta, and the pupils number nearly 500. There is also a girls' school, largely under Brahmo management. The prayer halls of both the Sadharan and New Dispensation Brahmos were completely destroyed by the now historic earthquake of 1897. I had the pleasure of conducting the first service in the newly-built hall of the Sadharan Brahmos, and of preaching at the opening meeting of the New Dispensation Church; and both societies expressed their gratitude for the aid given out of the fund raised by the Rev. James Harwood and Mr. A. M. Bose among the Unitarians of England. It seemed to me an infinite pity that in a small town like Mymensingh the Brahmo forces should be divided into two distinct societies between which, as far as I can learn, there are no real and fundamental differences of principle; but facts, however lamentable, must be accepted as they are. Mr. Sen, the District Judge of Mymensingh, is a sympathiser with the Brahmo movement, but has not attached himself as a member to any Brahmo society. He is deeply read in English and German systems of philosophy. He is a constant student of Kant and Hegel. I was told that he is also one of the most learned Sanscrit scholars. But he carries his stores of knowledge with a quiet, unassuming air. He is of a most modest disposition, and gentleness marks his every utterance respecting his fellow-men. He has the reputation of being an upright judge and a man of spotless character. Is such a man, my orthodox Christian brother, to be characterised and condemned as a stranger to the household of God?

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHES.

It must not be supposed that by this description the whole of the South of England from the North Foreland to the Land's End is intended, but a much more circumscribed area, that covered by the operations of the Southern Unitarian Association, including Hampshire and the Isle of Wight, a fringe of Dorset, and one place in Sussex, or a total of ten congregations in all, none very large or flourishing, some very small and struggling, so that no chronicle of striking or important events can be either expected or produced. Yet, as we are assured our friends in other parts like to hear we are still alive and working on in our quiet unpretending way, some brief record of recent doings may, perhaps, be deemed worthy of a place in this series of Letters.

The experiences of ministers and people in this district do not differ much from those of others in country places; we have not to complain of bigotry or persecution; we are left severely alone. Very occasionally we do come across a genuine instance of that dissatisfaction with the popular presentation of religion, and that longing for a liberal faith that will interpret the facts of the universe religiously without flouting and outraging reason and science, of which we hear so much; but, as a rule, Orthodoxy is so securely intrenched behind crass ignorance and dull heavy indifference on such matters that frontal attacks are out of the question and turning movements impracticable, and if we hold our own we do not deserve badly of the community. Taking a survey of our whole little field, without entering into details which from the nature of the case must be minute, we may fairly claim to do this. In two churches, Southampton and Newport, new ministers have taken up their work since the date of my last letter, and in them all their various religious and philanthropic agencies are steadily maintained.

The visit of the Rev. Stopford Brooke to the district could not fail to exert a stimulating influence, if only by giving our people the unwonted satisfaction of seeing their places of worship crowded to excess. And although we may not be able to point to tangible accessions of strength as a result of these services, yet the simple fact that multitudes have for once crowded our gates with thankful songs, must needs strengthen the dear hope of our hearts that the day is not far distant when this shall be the rule.

Two things stand out in our recent history, the initiation of the Twentieth Century Fund and the completion of the Dorchester Chapel Trust matter. We owe the first to the suggestion of the Rev. Clement Pike, whose principal object was to engage our people in a common effort and thus to encourage and deepen the feeling that, scattered as we are, yet we are one folk, one Church, one living body. One idea originally suggested was to hold a united bazaar, but the conditions of geography and the railway service proved on consideration to be adverse, and it has been decided to raise the money by personal canvass. The amount aimed at is £1,000 to form an endowment of the Southern Association and enable it to reach out a helping hand to whatever causes, old or new, in its district may require it. Without giving particulars, I may say with confidence that the money will be raised. The money, of course, is good, and will be useful, but the chief benefit of the movement lies in the strengthening of the sense of union.

The Dorchester Chapel affairs have taken a long time to settle, but they are settled at last, and a scheme has been sanctioned by the Charity Commissioners under which the chapel has been sold, and the proceeds of the sale, together with the old endowments, have been vested in Trustees, who are to pay the income to the Committee of the Southern Unitarian Association, which body is to distribute it for the support of religious worship on the lines of the Trust Deed of the Dorchester Chapel, which was perfectly open. Weymouth is to have a preference, and it is hoped that this will afford this latest child of the Association some much-needed encouragement and give it a fresh start.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Dundee.—On Sunday last the Rev. H. Williamson conducted special services in the church, it being the thirty-fourth anniversary of his settlement in Dundee. The afternoon service was devoted to the children attending the Sunday-school, which is in a prosperous condition. On Monday the annual church soirée was held in the schoolroom. The weather unfortunately was stormy, a severe snowstorm sweeping over the country. There was a large attendance of members and friends. The Rev. H. Williamson presided, and delivered an eloquent and interesting address, summing up the history of the congregation since the time of Thomas F. Palmer to the present. Songs and recitations were ably rendered by some of our juvenile friends, and several instructive and interesting addresses were delivered by members of the committee and other gentlemen. The usual votes of thanks terminated a happy and enjoyable meeting.

Glasgow: South St. Mungo-street.—The annual congregational soirée was held on the evening of Friday, Feb. 16. Despite the stormy weather which prevailed, the Rev. E. T. Russell had the pleasure of presiding over a large gathering of members and friends. During the evening inspiring addresses were delivered by the Chairman and by Mr. James Graham, President of the Scottish Unitarian Association. At a suitable interval in the excellent programme of part-songs, solos, readings, and violin selections contributed by the choir and other friends, Mr. Horton, on behalf of the members of the church, presented to Mr. Robert Anderson, late organist and choirmaster, a handsome marble timepiece as a token of the esteem in which he was held, and a memento of his labours on behalf of the church music.

Kilmarnock.—The Rev. A. C. Henderson, B.D., is conducting a week-night class for the study of astronomy, in addition to the minister's Bible-class on Sunday evenings. The subject is being illustrated by the orrery and lantern views. On the invitation of the Educational Committee of the Kilmarnock Co-operative Society, Mr. Henderson has agreed to deliver a lecture on "Electricity," under their auspices, on the last Wednesday of this month.

Liverpool Sunday-school Society.—A meeting of this Society was held on Thursday evening, Feb. 15, at the Unitarian Institute. There were about twenty-five members and friends present, the Rev. W. J. Jupp presiding. Papers were read by the Rev. Dr. Klein, Miss E. K. McConnell, and the Rev. J. L. Haigh, on "Bible Teaching," dealing especially with the first four chapters of "The Bible, its Origin, Growth and Character," by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland. The papers were given with a view to showing the teachers how to make the matter contained in these chapters interesting and instructive to the younger scholars in our Sunday-schools, and proved most helpful. A vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and seconded by Miss Florence Melly, was accorded to the readers of the papers.

London: Highgate.—Signs of increasing activity and vigour have soon begun to manifest themselves since the advent of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland. Interest is being aroused throughout the district, and congregations are rapidly increasing. Last Sunday morning's attendance is believed to have been the largest since the Rev. Robert Collyer preached here on his last visit to London. It included several visitors who had been attracted through the recent distribution of our Church calendar in the neighbourhood. Mr. Sunderland preached two most inspiring discourses on "Jesus as Humanity's Ideal" and "The Place of Enthusiasm in Life," and some of the visitors inquired for our tracts, and expressed their intention of coming again. Collections on behalf of the Indian Famine Fund produced the sum of £9 13s. Mr. Sunderland is already engaging heart and soul in all the activities of the church, and the workers are rallying around him. The Band of Hope has been revived, a brigade of Sunday-school boys organised to distribute literature. A week-night Bible-class has been started, and other developments are in contemplation. Altogether the congregation feel that, under their new pastor, a future of great usefulness and prosperity awaits them.

Nantwich (Resignation).—The Rev. J. Morley Mills has announced to the Committee his intention to conclude his ministry here at the end of July next, by which time he will have completed his eighth year at Nantwich. The resignation has been received with very general and deep regret. At a week-night service on Feb. 14, the Rev. L. de B. Klein, of Liverpool, lectured on "The Position of Unitarian Christianity at the End of the Nineteenth Century." He said that Unitarianism was no new movement, for the faith in one God, held by them, was older than Christianity itself, though in its amplitude and beauty it dated from Jesus Christ. Historically, Unitarian Christianity was primitive Christianity, gradually moulded and influenced by advancing knowledge in the course of the ages. The great prophets of Israel had, in distant times, made the grand and far-reaching discovery that God was one—a discovery being verified in a marvellous manner by every new scientific discovery of this age. Jesus had added to this discovery the lofty truth that the relation of God to man is that of father to child. The Unitarian Church stood in closest agreement with the fundamental principles of the early Christian Church, as enunciated by the writer to the Romans, "To us there is but one God, the Father," while those Churches which stated, "To us there is but one God the Father, Son and Holy Ghost" had wandered far, both in letter and spirit, from primitive Christianity. For themselves they refused to be bound by the letter that killed, and sought to be in harmony with the spirit that was living. As a Church they aimed at truth, sincerity, and freedom in worship. In the service of man it was their constant aim to promote goodness in every conceivable way, and to defeat evil by all means possible. With regard to the future, they strove to hand on to the coming century, not a dead or dying creed, but a living spirit, that might be to future generations a light, a guide, and a blessing.

Stalybridge.—The annual sermons were preached, on Feb. 11, by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Liverpool. Unfortunately the heavy fall of snow of Saturday night rendered the streets impassable, so that most places of worship were nearly empty, some quite so, on Sunday over the whole of the district. The consequence was that the collections were less than half of what they were a year ago. But those who were kept away have since sent in their contributions, which have brought up the amount to more than it was last year.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,

NARBOROUGH ROAD LEICESTER.

CHURCH BUILDING SCHEME.

The Congregation and Committee beg to acknowledge the following additional donations, with thanks. The new schoolroom has now been in use for a month, and there are already signs of increased success in our work amidst this rapidly growing neighbourhood. But it is most desirable that the building of the Church should be proceeded with, so that all our agencies may have free scope. Fully £1,000 is needed for the completion of the scheme.

It is highly desirable that this sum should be raised without resorting to a Bazaar, and the building opened free of debt.

Donations will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the following members of the Finance Committee :—

Rev. H. GOW, B.A., St. James'-road.
Rev. W. WHITAKER, B.A., 171, Hinckley-road.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE news of the surrender of Commandant Cronje to Lord Roberts on Tuesday brought not only intense relief that further appalling slaughter had been avoided by consummate generalship, but the hope that this might prove to be the first of a series of decisive steps towards bringing this lamentable war to an end. Thursday's news that Ladysmith had been relieved made in the same direction. It was, perhaps, too much to hope that we should be altogether spared the detestable cry of "Majuba revenged," but we may trust that the splendid courage, endurance, and resource displayed on both sides in this conflict may lead to a more generous estimate of opponents and a better mutual understanding. The Boers undoubtedly are convinced that they are fighting for the independence of their country. No "corrupt oligarchy" could command such services as have been rendered; and in whatever settlement our Government proposes we shall look most earnestly to see an assurance of genuine equality for the races which must live together in amity, if our influence for good in South Africa is to be maintained.

To the Memorial of Unitarian Ministers to Lord Salisbury which we published last week, the following signatures have since been added:—John Miskimmin, John Felstead, A. Leslie Smith, B.A., Herbert V. Mills, Charles Thrift, Matthew R. Scott, George Peglar.

WE publish to-day, under the general heading "Achievements of the Century," the first of three articles by the Rev. G. St. Clair, on "The Progress of Science and it Significance for Religion." This is the first instalment of the series of special articles which we announced at the end of last year, and in which we hope to furnish some record of the great movements of the century as bearing upon the development of religious life. Mr. St. Clair will be followed by the Rev. W. E. Addis, who will write on "The Progress of Old Testament Studies," and the Rev. J. E. Carpenter on "The Growth of the Comparative Study of Religions." In arranging for subsequent articles, it may not be possible to secure their appearance in any logical order, but when the series is complete, we trust that it will prove to be a record of permanent value, and we, therefore, suggest that interested readers should preserve the articles from the commencement, as it is often troublesome, if not impossible, to obtain back numbers.

The Interpreter and the New Dispensation, of Calcutta, appeared at the beginning of the year in a new and enlarged form under the editorship of our friend Babu Promotho Lall Sen. On Jan. 8 the anniversary of the death of Keshub Chunder Sen in 1884 was reverently observed, and in the following weeks the seventieth anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj was celebrated. On Saturday, Jan. 20, Babu Protap Chunder Mozoomdar delivered his anniversary lecture on "Eastern Ideas applied to Western Religion," in the Town Hall, the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady Woodburn being among the very representative audience. The Interpreter, of Jan. 21, opens with a memorial article on "Maharshi Martineau," beginning as follows:—

> In the midst of our anniversary festivities comes the news of the death of James Martineau, and touches us with a sorrow which we can better feel than describe. Dr. Martineau did not die young; he died full of years and honours. Had he lived five years more he would have completed a century. "Eighty-seven years have I travelled on earth," said the great Wesley, "endeavouring to do good." Well might Dr. Martineau have said, "Ninety-five years have I been on earth endeavouring to know God and love Him." For he belonged to that "lofty and sequestered class" who have been the prophets and oracles of the union of knowledge and love. His long life wholly spent in the pursuit and service of Truth reminds us of the rishis of our country, and we love to think of him to-day as Maharshi Martineau.

The Indian Messenger and Unity and the Minister have also made sympathetic references to the loss we have sustained.

THE twenty-second annual report of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj, issued from the office, 211, Cornwallis-street, Calcutta, and of which Mr. A. M. Bose, M.A., is president, contains a record of much earnest and self-sacrificing work. At the annual meeting held on Jan. 22 and adjourned to Jan. 27, a resolution of thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was passed for the constant practical interest shown in the work of the Somaj, in the Manchester College scholarship and by the representatives sent out to India. The following resolution was also passed:—

> That the members of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj assembled at this meeting express their sincere sorrow at the death of Dr. James Martineau, who through a long life of patient thought and earnest work rendered signal services to the cause of theism and set before us a high example of moral purity and spiritual elevation which has fed the spiritual life of thousands in all lands and they also convey their brotherly condolence to the members of the Doctor's bereaved family and to the Unitarian body of England at large.

IN consequence of a note which appeared in a recent issue of the British Weekly mentioning a speech by the late Richard Holt Hutton as containing the finest estimate of Dr. Martineau with which the writer was acquainted, we have received requests from various parts of the country for the INQUIRER'S report of the speech in question. It was made at the summer meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, held at University Hall, June 25, 1885, on the occasion of Dr. Martineau's retirement from the office of Principal of the College. We regret not to have been able to meet the demand for copies of the INQUIRER in which that meeting was reported, but are glad to learn that the official report of the whole proceedings in connection with Dr. Martineau's retirement, issued by the Committee of Manchester College, is still to be had, and that copies may be obtained at the cost of a shilling net, post free, from Mr. E. W. Marshall, 38, Barton-arcade, Manchester.

THE proceedings reported include the January meeting of Trustees, at which Dr. Martineau's letter of resignation was received, and notable speeches were made by Mr. R. D. Darbishire and the late Rev. John Hamilton Thom, the June meeting of Trustees, at which Mr. Hutton's speech was made, and also a speech of beautiful feeling and interesting reminiscence by the late Dr. Sadler, and the Students' Dinner, at which addresses were presented to Dr. Martineau from his old students, from the old Transylvanian students, and from Bishop Ferencz on behalf of the Consistory of the Hungarian Unitarians, and he made a delightful speech in response. The conclusion of that speech we cannot refrain from quoting here. After some vigorous words as to the wise use to be made of old age, Dr. Martineau concluded:—

> I may be wrong; but whatever humbling decrepitude may be in reserve for me hereafter, at the present moment neither is my remembrance of you dull, nor my joy in you cold. As I pass my glance round these tables, the successive dates that look silently from your features count my journey for me, as milestones on my way; and the only sadness is, that here and there, a blank has been made by early death, and the mark is visible only to my thought. This living itinerary is as consolatory to me as it is encouraging to my colleagues who will continue it, perhaps upon new tracks and with better speed. The future, like the past, will show that, without ancient pedigree or splendid traditions, thorough Academic work may yet be done. Our Alma Mater is certainly no Queenly personage, whose sons are Princes and Judges of the earth. Still, though but a City Matron, she sends forth honest men, whom none can deny to be, in fair proportion, good citizens of the States of the Republic of letters and of the Kingdom of God.

After all, I do not own or mean that this week shall sever me from you, as perhaps you think. I do but step down from one stage of relation to you into another—as from this daïs of distinction to the level of your floor. I quit my post of teacher, to take my place among you as an old student—so old that, as one of the milestones in the College history of which I spoke, it must appear to you quite away from the now frequented track, moss-grown and dim in the far perspective, mingled already with the hedge-row and the grassy road. There, however, let me stand and be counted with you. Accept me as your comrade; and let us join our vows of filial loyalty to Manchester New College.

The report also includes Dr. Martineau's letters in reply to the resolution of the Trustees and the various addresses. We understand that only about sixty copies of this interesting memorial are still to be had, so that application for them should be made at once.

The March number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in memory of Dr. Martineau, under the title "A Lover of Wisdom." Three distinguishing features Mr. Hargrove noted in Dr. Martineau, and spoke of them at length, Vitality, Veracity, and Catholicity. On this last he dwelt at the end of his sermon, as follows:—

"And thirdly, while to the great hindrance of that advance in life which all men desire, and hindrance many would add to his influence and usefulness in the world, while he always avowed a name which is held in dread by religious people and disowned by good society, while he belonged to one of the smallest religious bodies of the country, and was judged by many Unitarians extreme in his views, he was at the same time a true Catholic. One who recognised truth and goodness in whatever communion they showed themselves, who himself refused to own any limit of sympathy and fellowship narrower than those of the Church Universal. The test of membership he would have imposed would not have been, 'Do you agree with me in believing so much and in rejecting so much else?' But this only 'Do you love God and your neighbour according to the teaching of Jesus Christ?' If so—and it is not for man, but for Him who reads all hearts to judge how far your profession is sincere—if so, then are you a member of the Church of God on earth, and it is not within the jurisdiction of Pope or Council or Assembly to shut you out. So have we learnt of his constant teaching. There is no Unitarian Church, there are a few thousands of us who do not believe in Trinitarian theology and who do believe that men are accepted with God not according to what they believe about Him, but as they love.

"Life, long and full, was his magnificent endowment, Truth the service to which he devoted it, the Fellowship of all good men and women, the Church he loved and served. There are many other aspects of his character and work. I have spoken of what have most struck me, but whatever I have omitted was all in harmony with these, and the rich full diapason of all his powers and efforts and achievements has one grand tone, whose interpretation is the ascent to God, the drawing ever nearer to the Life which is Eternal, the Light which is without shadow, the Love which embraces all."

The retirement of the Bishop of Liverpool on account of the increasing infirmities of old age took effect on Wednesday. Dr. Ryle was the first Bishop of Liverpool, appointed in 1880 to take charge of a diocese which had up to that time been under the care of the Bishop of Chester. An article in the Liverpool Diocesan Calendar speaks of Bishop Ryle as "one of the staunchest of friends, one of the wisest of counsellors, one of the truest of men, one who had deeply rooted convictions that Evangelical principles, as founded on the Word of God, held, taught, and lived out, are calculated to do more than anything else for the stability of the Church and for the eternal welfare of the souls of the people, and yet one who was willing to appreciate the good in others who differed from him, and ready to acknowledge that the advancement of education had produced a condition of things which required the services of our Church to be conducted 'decently and in order,' without extremes on the one hand or slovenliness on the other." The diocese when he took charge of it contained a population of over 1,200,000, with only 182 beneficed clergy and 93 curates. Since then forty-four new churches have been consecrated, and the number of the clergy greatly increased. The scheme for a Cathedral failed to meet with adequate support, but a Diocesan Church House is in course of erection, and other diocesan institutions have made marked progress. It is said that Dr. Ryle is to reside at Lowestoft, which for many years has been his favourite holiday resort.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, as President of the National Temperance League, issued a circular from Lambeth Palace dated Nov. 1, 1898, convening a congress of the World's Temperance Workers, to be held in the Medical Examination Halls, London, from June 9 to 18, 1900. The inception of the Congress is due to the National Temperance League, and a general committee, representing forty-four national societies of Great Britain, has been appointed to carry out the details. No less than seventy organisations of all branches of Temperance work in the United Kingdom, and twenty-five foreign and colonial societies, have already intimated their intention to appoint delegates, and it is anticipated that this will be the most influentially attended gathering of Temperance workers ever held. The programme of the Congress will include every aspect of the Temperance question, which will be dealt with by experts in their various departments; historical papers will present the exact position of the Temperance movement throughout the world at the date of the Congress. Addresses will be given by the President of the Congress, and by the Presidents of the several sections; official sermons will be preached, and social receptions of the delegates, and various public demonstrations, will take place. Arrangements are being made for foreign delegates to visit public institutions, the experience in connection with which bears upon the Temperance question. The importance of the occasion is enhanced by the fact that it will be held within a few months of the opening of the new century, and that it will indicate what practical measures are desirable for the promotion of Temperance reform in the coming epoch. Application for further information and membership enrolment forms should be made to Mr. Robert Rae, Secretary of the National Temperance League, 34, Paternoster-row, London, E.C.

In connection with the Manchester Domestic Mission it is interesting to recall one of the most beautiful of the Rev. William Gaskell's hymns, which was written, if we are not mistaken, for the funeral of one of the first, if not the first, minister to the poor, appointed by the Society, and who died at his post:—

Calmly, calmly lay him down!
He hath fought a noble fight;
He hath battled for the right;
He hath won the fadeless crown!

Memories all too bright for tears,
Crowd around us from the past;
He was faithful to the last,—
Faithful through long toilsome years.

All that makes for human good,
Freedom, righteous, and truth,—
These, the objects of his youth,
Unto age he still pursued.

Meek and gentle was his soul,
Yet it had a glorious might;
Clouded minds it filled with light,
Wounded spirits it made whole.

Huts where poor men sat distressed,
Homes where death had darkly passed,
Beds where suffering breathed its last,—
These he sought, and soothed, and blessed.

Hoping, trusting, lay him down!
Many in the realms above
Look for him with eyes of love,
Wreathing his immortal crown.

The Church Gazette, which vigorously maintains the position of the Broad Churchmen who are opposed to Disestablishment, will, after the present week, be reduced in price to a penny.

Caution.—The Rev. C. J. Street, of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, warns ministers and others against an impostor giving the name of George Hall, Henry Hall, Chas. Henshaw, George Henshall, &c., and falsely representing himself as having been connected with Bank-street Chapel and Young Men's Class. He has a habit of turning up on Saturday night with a story about having obtained work at the Tramway Depôt to start on the following Monday, but sometimes he is on the lookout for a coachman's berth. He seems to have been active lately in the Manchester District.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

The Progress of Science and its Significance for Religion.

I.

Theology is always based on science, whether true science or false; that is to say, it has its foundation in what people know, or think they know, of Nature and Man. But until the present century the science which served the theologian was that which was so called by the Hebrew writers thousands of years ago, whereas in modern times a more adequate knowledge of Nature has been gained. One of the main features of the nineteenth century has been the stupendous progress of scientific knowledge, and the wealth of inventions following in its train. It is hard to realise that the century began without gas-light and lucifers, as well as without telegraphs and telephones, railways and steamships. It also began without any well-proved knowledge of the earth's antiquity, the origin of species, or the primitive condition of man; without knowing anything of the nature of comets or the chemistry of the stars; without the truth of the conservation of energy or the correlation of physical forces. Time had not seen the birth of Lyell and Murchison, of Faraday and Tyndall, of Huxley, Darwin and Spencer—to name only some of our own. Inquiry has now been carried back into the ages before "Adam"; forbidden fields have been fearlessly explored, and the human mind rejoices in a sense of spaciousness and freedom.

Geology is a modern science, undreamed of by the Bible writers. "Even at the close of the eighteenth century, geology appears to have been regarded as little other than a subordinate department of mineralogy." It was known that fossil shells were found in the interior of continents, but the majority of people were persuaded that they were carried thither by Noah's Flood. Much ingenuity was employed to make every fact agree exactly with the Mosaic account of the Creation and Deluge; and this was the reason why Voltaire supported the old contention that fossil shells were sports of Nature, and that plant impressions were not real. As yet no scientific "theory of the earth" existed, although there were books with such a title. But in 1807 the Geological Society of London was founded, and began patiently to multiply and record observations with a view to furnishing materials for some future generalisation. "Never, perhaps," says Lyell, "did any science, with the exception of astronomy, unfold in an equally brief period so many novel and unexpected truths, and overturn so many preconceived opinions."

It has been abundantly shown that the crust of the earth consists of a series of strata which have been for the most part laid down under water; and that each new layer, as it was deposited, embedded some of the shells and bones, the tree-trunks and plant-growths of the time. The greater part of these belonged to forms now extinct; but the succession of species was pretty uniform for the same strata, comparing different localities. For them to have grown and spread and flourished, and dwindled and died out, seemed to call for long periods of time; and this requirement was supported by the evidently slow deposition of the materials, which could only be carried down by rivers, or accumulate from the exuviæ of sea creatures; and yet now have a thickness of many miles. A mere six days' creation was absurdly insufficient; and those who cared for Scripture must read the Genesis account in a different way. For many years the Christian apologists were occupied with Reconciliation Theories and the books of Hugh Miller, Dr. Pye Smith, and Professor Hitchcock of America, found interested readers. It was shown that the word day is an elastic term, and might mean a long period; it was suggested that the work of each day was exhibited to the seer in a series of visions; it was argued by Pye Smith that the field of creation and deluge was a limited region of the earth, near the Caspian Sea, while the processes of geologic change had all the rest of the world to themselves. But there was no agreement among the writers, and as each of them brought out new editions of their books, it was disconcerting to find them criticising one another.

All these writers were on the wrong tack, and should not have sought to defend Scripture infallibility in matters of science. It might be allowed to them that the words "In the beginning" relate to earlier time than the verses that follow; it might be conceded that perhaps the Bible writer only meant to describe a local or partial deluge; and yet the phrases could not be made to square with the facts. It had to be confessed that the method of creation had not been by fiat at all; and it might as well have been recognised that the order of events in Genesis does not correspond to the facts of geology. A desultory fire was kept up by some writers who succeeded the champions just named, but the warfare may be said to have ended some fifteen years ago, when Huxley combatted Gladstone in the magazines. The Book of Genesis speaks of all our shrubs and trees appearing on the third day of creation, and not before; and of aquatic animals and birds appearing on the fifth day, before which time there was no animal life at all; and says that all terrestrial animals other than birds made their appearance on the sixth day and not before. But this is not the order in which we find the remains covered up in the rocks. Any literal understanding of the Genesis narrative is finally discredited.

Even before this duel the facts were almost too much for the special pleaders; and Pye-Smith, at least—a Professor at Homerton Independent College—had made important concessions. He not only allowed the vast antiquity of the earth, but marshalled convincing evidence in favour of it. He not only recognised fossils as real remains of past life, but was ready to believe that perhaps one species had been evolved from another, "a comprehensive germ" having been created in the first instance. Such ideas, however, were not welcome to the majority. Nor were orthodox believers pleased with the testimony of the rocks that there was death in the world before Adam sinned—that the creatures of successive æons of time had died, and some of them had even been carnivorous. If dragons of the prime had torn each other in their slime, how could it be true that the fruit of the forbidden tree brought death into the world and all our woe?

The rocks with fossils were many thousands of feet in thickness, and any remains of man that could be discovered were near the surface. Yet even surface deposits and cave remains had taken a long time to form, or at least had been formed so long ago that 6,000 years was insufficient. Evidence of the great antiquity of man began to accumulate. In various caves his remains, or the works of his hands, were found in association with the bones and teeth of hyenas, bears, and other beasts, of species not only absent from our island now but extinct altogether. In Kent's Hole, near Torquay, with Roman coins in the surface soil, there are hyenas' bones lower down, imbedded in stalagmite which hardly grows perceptibly thicker in a century. Two superposed beds of stalagmite are each several feet in thickness, and have the remains of charcoal fires between them and man-made implements under them. When Mr. McEnery in 1825 discovered worked flints along with the animal remains—animals extinct—he was laughed at; but the cavern has been explored systematically for the British Association, and the facts are now undisputed. Since man first took shelter in Kent's Cavern many species of animals have died out, and England has twice been joined to the Continent by an isthmus at the Straits of Dover. Old river gravels and other evidences confirm the testimony of the caves. It used to be believed that all such cave deposits were to be accounted for by the deluge of Noah, which broke up the former countries inhabited by men, and washed these remains into these quiet nooks, having first mixed them up. Baron Cuvier expressed an opinion of the kind in 1826, and Dean Buckland, in his "Reliquiæ Deluvianæ," published in 1823, had set forth the same views. But in 1836 Dr. Buckland, in his "Bridgewater Treatise," quietly withdrew from the position, and suggested that caves containing bones of extinct animals had afterwards been used as burial places. The spread of information on such points is forcibly illustrated in the "Phases of Faith" of F. W. Newman, who relates his surprise at an early stage of his progress on hearing Dr. Arnold declare the narrative of the Deluge to be mythical, and the Mosaic cosmogony to be of no real importance to the Christian faith. Flint implements found by M. Boucher de Perthes, in the valley of the Somme in Picardy, occasioned great discussions in the years 1860–3; but competent English geologists appointed to investigate the facts were satisfied. In 1863 Lyell published his evidences of the antiquity of man, and there is now no question of the fact, although whether the 6,000 years is to be extended to 16,000, or 60,000, or more, can hardly be regarded as settled.

The inferences from the mass of facts were very startling also in another way; it was clearly shown that Cave-man—or Palæolithic man, as he is called, from his old-stone implements—must have been a savage. He may have been mild in manners and innocent as a child, but he cannot have been civilised. This of course long ago occurred to many who even believed in a Golden Age: before the present Iron Age there was an age of Bronze. It turns out, however, that before bronze the weapons and instruments of mankind were not of silver and gold, but of bone and stone. And before men became clever enough to polish the stones they used them roughly chipped. All tribes have not advanced together in the path of civilisation, and some are savages still. In New Guinea, in our own day, the best knives of the natives have been flakes of flint. And then flint knives and axes and hammers are found in the valley of the Thames, showing that the natives of Britain were at one time no more advanced. And similar implements in the Somme valley, in the Nile valley, in India, in America—everywhere—tell us that mankind everywhere were once uncivilised. The bearing of these facts on the story of Paradise and the doctrine of the Fall of Man could not fail to be perceived.

But the waters of this flood were to rise higher yet. The connection of the sciences forces itself upon the attention of all who study them; for when we think to confine our inquiry to one, we find that it interlocks with others all round. This is so because of the unity of Nature, which knows no sharp lines of demarcation. A true and worthy idea of "Cosmos" was first fully and emphatically brought into its rightful position by the great work of Humboldt. It had already been shown that the operation of gravitation is universal, extending to the stars; all the physical dead world was given up to the domain of law: and now science prepared to claim also life and mind. In 1844 a book called the "Vestiges of Creation," published anonymously, caused great commotion both in religious and scientific circles. The author says, "This book, as far as I am aware, is the first attempt to connect the natural sciences into a history of creation." He adopted the Nebular Hypothesis of Laplace, according to which the solar system began in Fire-mist, and settled down to what it is, through the operation of natural law. He described the succession of rocks and fossils; maintained that they showed a progress upward; and broached an hypothesis of the origin and development of the vegetable and animal kingdoms by natural causes. He regards it as an open question whether mankind had more than one origin; but he finds arguments against their original civilisation. The spirit of the book is fair, reverent, and in a broad sense Christian; and the author claims that neither the nebular hypothesis nor his own is any exclusion of the Deity, but only a description of the Divine mode of working. It is known now that the author of the "Vestiges" was Robert Chambers; and when we consider his social position, his publishing business, and the orthodoxy of Scotch Presbyterians sixty years ago, we cannot wonder that he withheld his name, though possibly it was simply from modesty.

The "Vestiges" and many other books prepared the way for Darwin's "Origin of Species" and the works with which he followed it up, storming the position by sheer weight of evidence. Previous writers, suggesting the transmutation of species, hazarded a guess; but Darwin worked out a theory of natural selection and showed how favoured races are preserved in the struggle for existence. The evolution of all existing life-forms from a very few originals, became an accepted belief among naturalists, and the discussion since has been mainly as to the precise lines along which Evolution has worked, and not as to the fact and principle. Darwin's "Origin of Species" was met with opposition and ridicule, not only because it denied the doctrine of separate creations, but because it was seen that if applied to man it would conflict with the received account of his origin. In a later work of Darwin's, called the "Descent of Man," his derivation from an ape-like ancestor was boldly maintained; and the germs of all his qualities traced in the lower animals. In favour of this conclusion it is pointed out that man is formed on the same general plan as other animals in the class Mammalia; his frame answers, bone for bone and muscle for muscle, with that of the creatures next below him. Darwin found a doubty champion in Professor Huxley; and although Huxley, for some years, only regarded natural selection as the most likely hypothesis, he pronounced evolution proved in the case of the horse, when he visited America and saw the fossil progenitors of the animal. The more distant ancestor was there, and the "links" were not missing and not doubtful.

Here then, through Evolution, was man brought upon the scene without any special act or word of his Maker; and the long line of his predecessors had come into existence in the same natural way. Not only was the Fall affected, and the Six Days' work shown to be non-literal, but the very idea of creation was changed. It appeared that throughout Nature, one phase of things gives birth to another, by slow kaleidoscopic change, apparently without beginning and without end; yet not in the way of vain repetitions, but rather of development, and tendency to fruition and a goal. Creation thus conceived of is still proceeding, and no one can say what glorious things it may not bring to pass in the future. Evolution, once apprehended, is seen to be applicable, not only to Biology, but to star-systems, to the birth and growth of worlds, to history, morality, and probably to all things. The Creator is not dispensed with; but instead of standing outside His work, He lives in all things and works His sovereign will by methods of Law.

Geo. St. Clair.

The perennial fountains of Religion lie in the deepest wells of our nature, in the primary essence of the Reason and the Moral consciousness: but, to suit the ease of "the natural man," there is a constant tendency in more superficial faculties to take possession of it as it rises and treat it as their own. Imagination is delighted with it, mistakes its character, and plays with it perilous experiments of colour and of form; which at last tempts the Senses themselves to claim it and set it fast in some "graven image which shall not be moved." Invert this order of degeneracy, and you recover the purity and reality of faith. Iconoclasm has already dispossessed the Senses: the perishing of Mythology is fast bringing Imagination to repentance and inducing it to lower its sceptre; and we reach the ultimate simplicity of Christ—"the Spirit which beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."—James Martineau.

LITERATURE.

JOHN CAIRD.*

II.—The Gifford Leatures.

Whether one accepts, or does not accept, the Hegelian philosophy which gives their distinctive character to these interesting Lectures, there can be no hesitation in saying that they abound in ideas and sentiments which religious thinkers of all schools will surely find most helpful and inspiring. It must be added, however, that the readers of the work who are not intellectually critical or exacting, and who know little or nothing of philosophic theories, will probably imagine their agreement with Dr. Caird's views to be much greater than would really be the case if they could see beneath the surface of the elegant, and at times semi-orthodox, phraseology to the author's real and fundamental meaning. Such readers will be apt to suppose that Dr. J. Caird's philosophy of religion is practically much the same as that which underlies the religious teaching of such eminent theists as Dr. James Martineau, F. W. Newman and Miss Frances Power Cobbe; whereas, in point of fact, there exists a great and impassable gulf between the conception of God and of His relation to human souls advocated by the three writers we have just mentioned, and the conception which forms the ground-work of Dr. Caird's Gifford Lectures. The difference indeed between these two modes of conceiving God's relation to humanity is so deep as to penetrate to the very roots of all ethical and religious thought.

But before we attempt to explain the nature of this basal difference, we will first essay the easier and pleasanter task of indicating the substantial agreement which exists between Dr. Caird and Dr. Martineau on such important questions as "The Relation between Natural and Revealed Religion," and that between "Reason and Faith," which are discussed in the first two lectures. In the former of these lectures we are told that Revelation as conceived by Dr. Caird "so far from carrying us into a region foreign to human experience and human consciousness, so far from being a mere oracle in a book, points to something in fact and life that is most profoundly true and real—to ideas and principles that interpenetrate the very being and essence of humanity; to hopes, aspirations, ideals, which are the very web and woof of the drama of human history." Our readers will not need to be told that this view of Revelation is closely akin to that set forth by Dr. Martineau in his account of "The Seat of Authority in Religion." When, too, in the second lecture Dr. Caird appears to admit that the primary organ of religious knowledge is not reason but faith or intuition, and that "one of the functions of conscious reason is to purify our intuitions from foreign or spurious admixture," he seems here also to assert a relationship between Faith and Reason which followers of Dr. Martineau would generally endorse. Nor would they see any ground to dissent from Dr. Caird's statement in the same lecture that

* "The Fundamental Ideas of Christianity." By John Caird, D.D., LL.D., late Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Glasgow. With a Memoir by Edward Caird, D.C.L., LL.D., Master of Balliol. 2 vols. Glasgow: James MacLehose and Sons. 1899. 12s. net.

"reason translates the necessarily inadequate language in which ordinary thought represents spiritual truth into that which is best fitted to express its purely ideal reality."

But when we ask the further question, What is the language which is best fitted to express the purely ideal reality of spiritual truth? we soon find that these two distinguished religious philosophers are by no means at one in their answers to this inquiry. It is, accordingly, when we come to the third lecture in which Dr. Caird discusses "The Christian Idea of God," and to the four succeeding lectures in which he treats of "The Relation of God to the World," and, after indicating the defects of Deism on the one hand, and of Pantheism on the other, expounds his own conception of God as the higher reconciling view which embraces all that is true in the two opposing systems which he rejects—it is here that we feel ourselves obliged to take serious exception to his doctrine, and to maintain that, if his utterances on these subjects are to be made self-consistent, they imply a view of God and of His relation to human souls which is wholly irreconcilable with that conception of Sin and of Human Responsibility which pervades and characterises the Christian scriptures. When we first heard that Dr. John Caird was to give these lectures on "The Fundamental Ideas of Christianity," we wondered exceedingly how, if he held substantially the views enunciated by his brother in the latter's graceful lectures on "The Evolution of Religion," he could possibly find any philosophical explanation and justification of that assumed possible, and at times actual, antagonism between the spirit of man and the Father within it which is often expressly stated, and is continually implied, in nearly every chapter of the New Testament writings. On reading these lectures, however, our feeling of wonderment was converted into one of supreme disappointment; for, so far as this question of Sin and Responsibility is concerned, we found that the lecturer in one part of his work uses language about the Freedom of the Will which would compel nearly every one of his hearers and readers to believe that on this fundamental point he is quite at one with such libertarians as James Martineau, Hermann Lotze, and Professor William James, while in another part of his work he quietly acquiesces in the Hegelian doctrine that it is neither possible nor conceivable that a man in times of temptation should be capable of making a different moral decision to that which he actually does make. On page 168 of the first volume we read:—

> Finally, if we may not say that man's nature involves the necessity, it at least involves the possibility, of sin. Whatever may be said for the notion of the actual existence of evil as implied in the moral development of a finite nature, every step in that process implies a conscious self-determination to one of many possible objects or ends, a conscious identification of our will with one object or end which we conceive of as our good, and therefore the possibility of an opposite alternative. [The italics are ours.] Moral freedom does not mean an unmotived will, but a will which has in it a power of self-determination, and therefore of wrong determination.

Surely if this language has any meaning at all it means that a man may rationally blame himself for wilful wrongdoing because it was in his power in the moment of temptation to have determined otherwise. But, strange to say, when we come to the eleventh lecture, we are confronted with the familiar Hegelian witticism that to base moral accountability on such freedom of the will as Martineau and Lotze contend for, "is to make a man accountable for his actions simply because neither he nor anybody else can account for them." This statement, of course, means that in our author's view (in that particular passage), given adequate knowledge of a man's character, such as God may be assumed to have, it would be evident that under certain circumstances of moral temptation he would inevitably act in one, and one only, determinate way, and thus, in Hegelian phraseology, the moral decision is "accounted for." But, as the three libertarian thinkers we have referred to point out, the moral decision in being so accounted for is thereby declared to be the only one possible under the circumstances; and hence if we accept Dr. Caird's doctrine in his eleventh lecture, his assertion in his seventh lecture of "the possibility of an opposite alternative" becomes either a palpable misstatement or else unintelligible nonsense. The outcome of the doctrine of the will given in the eleventh lecture is in perfect accord with T. H. Green's statement (Vol. II., p. 319) that "a man being what he is, and the circumstances being what they are at any particular conjuncture, the determination of the will is already given, just as an effect is given in the sum of its conditions. The determination of the will might be different, but only through the man's being different." It is also in perfect accord with Dr. Edward Caird's statement in his Gifford Lectures (Vol. II., p. 24) that one reason for rejecting the libertarian theory of moral choice is "that it offends science by the assertion of a kind of freedom in individuals which seems to be the negation of all laws of causation." The critical reader, then, of these two volumes is placed in the following perplexing predicament. If he asks, as he may well do, the question, "Could I have left my so-called sins undone?" he finds Dr. John Caird in effect emphatically replying:—"Certainly you could: you could have chosen the other possible alternative; and it is because of this that you rightly hold yourself responsible and blameworthy." But when the reader reaches the eleventh chapter he finds this same eminent authority replying just as emphatically: "Certainly you could not; for to say 'you could' would be the negation of all laws of causation; and would indeed be equivalent to asserting that you could at the same time be yourself and also somebody else."

We remember soon after T. H. Green's time reading a sermon written by a student fresh from Balliol College, in which the writer dwelt with great earnestness on the misery which accompanies estrangement from God through wilful sin, and on our manifesting some astonishment that a professed disciple of Green should so express himself, our young friend's reply was that before sitting down to write a sermon he did his best to get all his philosophy out of his head. We should add, however, that this method hardly answered, for this young man's stay in the ministry of religion was a very brief one. Now Dr. John Caird in these lectures certainly did not try to get all his philosophy out of his head; but what he appears to have done was to express himself sometimes in his capacity as a Christian teacher, and at other times in his capacity as a philosophic thinker of the Hegelian type. And surely the moral of this is, that while it is comparatively easy for an academic philosopher to ignore or deny the reality of man's free choice in moral temptations between possible alternatives, it is very difficult for a minister of religion so to do; and if he does so, it is at the imminent risk of paralysing all his appeals to the moral consciousness of his hearers, and so virtually rendering his preaching of little or no effect. Hence we greatly doubt whether the Hegelian doctrine of the Will found its way into many of Dr. J. Caird's eloquent and impressive pulpit discourses. In them it is highly probable that he always spoke as he speaks in his seventh lecture, that is in such a way as to leave the impression that his theory of Moral Freedom agreed with that of James Martineau rather than with that of his brother and of T. H. Green. And surely this apparently involuntary and spontaneous homage to the former theory furnishes the strongest confirmatory evidence that it is this theory alone which affords completest satisfaction to the human soul in its highest ethical and spiritual moods. There can be little doubt that it is largely owing to this side of Hegelian thought, which denies all real dualism and possible antagonism of causal will in the relation between God and man, that the once strong influence of Hegelianism over the theological thought of Germany has become entirely a thing of the past, and that even in Oxford the enthusiasm which it once kindled in the more thoughtful of the ministers of religion has to a great extent faded away and in some notable instances has passed into vigorous criticism and resolute opposition.

We have dwelt at some length on this aspect of Dr. Caird's lectures, partly because it has a most important bearing on the relation of philosophy to Christian thought and sentiment, and partly because it serves to illustrate what we said at the opening of this article, that there are many passages in these volumes which the general render will receive with assent and even with admiration because he will interpret them in accordance with the philosophical conceptions concerning God and man which are generally current among Theists and Christians, and will probably not realise the fact that the meaning thus given to them is essentially different from that which is demanded by their author's underlying philosophy. Take, for instance, the assertion at the close of the fifteenth lecture that "in the person and life of Christ we can recognise a will that never vibrated by one faintest aberration from the Infinite Will": this surely implies that in other persons wills do at times vibrate in a manner discordant with the Infinite Will. Yet if the philosophy advocated in other parts of these lectures be accepted, it is not conceivable that the character of any person should be capable of passing through a process of moral development in the slightest degree different from that through which it actually does pass; and, therefore, the statement that this process of personal evolution is at variance with the Infinite Will involves an intrinsic absurdity.

This reference to the character of Jesus reminds us that the second volume contains several critical lectures on "Theories of the Incarnation," in the course of which the author expounds his own view of the incarnation of God in Christ, and endeavours to refute what he calls "the Unitarian or Deistic view." We must leave the examination of these lectures, and also of Dr. Caird's views on the Future Life, to a concluding paper.

WHAT AFTER THE WAR?*

After reading Mr. Hobson's book we are more painfully convinced than ever that the war in which this country is engaged in South Africa is a stupendous and criminal blunder. Mr. Hobson was in South Africa last year, as representative of the Manchester Guardian, and a considerable part of the earlier chapters of his book, describing the actual condition of things in the two Boer Republics, has already been published in that journal, while the substance of other chapters has appeared in the Speaker. At Pretoria and Bloemfontein during the critical time of the negotiations and at Capetown after the war began he was able to make first-hand observations, and the information he obtained and has embodied in this book sets matters in a very different light from that which the South African Press, almost exclusively owned by the capitalists of Kimberley and the Rand, made current in this country.

Under the dispassionate examination of this capable observer the grievances of the Outlanders are reduced to their true proportions, shameless calumnies against the Boers are exposed, while their real faults are not ignored, and the terrible nature of this conflict, which has been studiously fomented by misrepresentation, in the interest of alien capitalists, is clearly set forth. The alleged "Dutch conspiracy" vanishes before Mr. Hobson's examination, and on the other hand we are appalled to see the unscrupulous part that has been played by the "Chartered Press."

We cannot here describe in detail the course of Mr. Hobson's argument, but he shows, to our mind conclusively, what the ruling motive has been, which has succeeded in bringing about this war. The first part of the book, dealing with "the Boer Republics in 1899," concludes with the following passage:—

> If this war can be successfully accomplished, and a "settlement" satisfactory to the mine-owners can be reached, the first fruits of victory will be represented in a large, cheap, submissive supply of black and white labour, attended by such other economies of "costs" as will add millions per annum to the profits of the mines. It is no extravagance to argue that the blood and the money of the people of Great Britain are being spent for this purpose; that at present no other definite tangible result of the conflict can be shown: The men who, owning the South African Press and political organisations, engineered the agitation which has issued in this war, are the same men whose pockets will swell with this increase; open-eyed and persistent they have pursued their course, plunging South Africa into a temporary ruin in order that they may emerge victorious, a small confederacy of international mine-owners and speculators holding the treasures of South Africa in the hollow of their hands.

Those of our readers who think it incredible that the Government of this country, and the nation as a whole, should have been so misled as to become practically the instrument of this sinister power we can only beg to give the most careful and unprejudiced consideration to Mr. Hobson's book. And as an added motive that they should do so, in the interest of the honour of this country, quite as much as of the true welfare of South Africa, we will quote another passage, dealing with the native question.

> Let us get rid at all hazards of the cant about a righteous war for redress of native grievances. This war may procure for us more gold and more cheap labour, but there is not much likelihood that it will issue even incidentally in any gain to the natives. No betterment of native treatment can in the nature of the case be imposed upon South Africa from Downing-street; a matter of such intimate detailed internal policy must always remain in the hands of South Africans. Dutch and British South Africans do not widely differ in their view of native questions, and if they did the British could not practically control the Dutch, whose social and economic relations with the natives over most parts of the country are far closer. In so far as the future of the British in South Africa is linked with the exploitation of mines, there is, unfortunately, at present little reason to believe that the kind of man who will control this industry, and the profitable ends he has in view, will in any way contribute to that elevation of the native races which we profess to have at heart.

The truth of that judgment is forcibly borne out by the facts marshalled in Mr. Fox Bourne's pamphlet, from which we have already quoted, and which is named here together with Mr. Hobson's book. The treatment of the natives in Rhodesia and at Kimberley furnishes a painful commentary on much of the advocacy of the righteousness of this war and the beneficent results likely to be attained.

We trust that Mr. Hobson's book will be very widely read, and that the great service it may render to this country will not be too late in making for a wise and generous use of the victory which now seems to be assured to the British forces in South Africa.

JULIA WARD HOWE.

The "Reminiscences" of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, with which readers of the Atlantic Monthly have already made acquaintance, are now issued as one of Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin, and Co.'s attractive volumes, with portraits and other illustrations. The writer of that noble Battle Hymn of the Republic, "Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord," an ardent anti-slavery worker, an advocate of Peace, one of the early leaders of the Woman's movement, Mrs. Howe has much that is of the deepest interest to tell of her long life of eighty years. Born in 1819 at New York, she married in 1844 Dr. S. G. Howe, of Boston, who, twenty years before, as a young man, had served as a surgeon in the Greek war of Independence. As a philanthropist, he is best known as the founder of schools for the blind, and for the deaf and dumb, in Boston. He died in 1876.

From Mrs. Howe's "Reminiscences" the following passages have a special interest for our readers:—

> "In the autumn of 1844 we returned from our wedding journey and took up our abode in the near neighbourhood of the city of Boston, of which at intervals I had already enjoyed some glimpses. These had shown me Margaret Fuller, holding high communion with her friends in her well-remembered 'Conversations,' Ralph Waldo Emerson who was then breaking ground in the field of his subsequent great reputation; and many another who has since been widely heard of.
> "I count it as one of my privileges to have listened to a single sermon from Dr. Channing, with whom I had some personal acquaintance. I can remember only a few passages. Its theme must have been the divine love; for Dr. Channing said that God loved black men as well as white men, poor men as well as rich men, and bad men as well as good men. This doctrine was quite new to me, but I received it gladly.
> "I first heard of Theodore Parker as the author of the sermon on 'The Transient and the Permanent in Christianity.' At the time of its publication I was still within the fold of the Episcopal Church, and judging by hearsay was prepared to find the discourse a tissue of impious and sacrilegious statements, yet I ventured to peruse a copy of it that fell into my hands. I was surprised to find it reverent and appreciative in spirit, although somewhat startling in its conclusions. The interest my husband took in Theodore Parker's preaching led me to attend his services and I remember, as among the great opportunities of my life, the years in which I listened to Theodore Parker. Those who knew Parker only in the pulpit did not half know him. Apart from the field of theological controversy he was one of the most sympathetic and delightful of men, I have rarely met anyone whose conversation had such a ready and varied charm. His idea of culture was encyclopædic, and his reading, as might have been inferred from the size of his library, was enormous. The purchase of books was his single extravagance. One whole floor was given up to them, and in spite of this they overflowed into hall and drawing-room. He was very generous in lending them, and I often profited by his kindness in this respect. I cannot remember that the interest of his sermons ever varied for me. It was all one intense delight. The luminous clearness of his mind, his admirable talent for popularising the procedures and conclusions of philosophy, his keen wit and poetic sense of beauty, all these combined to make him appear to me one of the oracles of God. Add to these his fearlessness and his power of denunciation, exercised in a community a great part of which seemed bound in moral sleep. His voice was like the Archangel's trump summoning the wicked to repentance and bidding the just take heart. It was hard to go out from his presence, all aglow with the enthusiasm which he felt and inspired and to hear him spoken of as a teacher of irreligion, a pest to the community."

Moving in the most polished society of Boston, Mrs. Howe knew little of the abolitionists. She says:—

"I had supposed the abolitionists to be men and women of rather coarse fibre, abounding in cheap and easy denunciation, and seeking to lay rash hands on the complex machinery of government and of society. Theodore Parker held them in great esteem, and it was through him that one of my strongest imaginary dislikes vanished as though it had never been. The object of this dislike was William Lloyd Garrison, whom I had never seen, but of whose malignity of disposition I entertained not the smallest doubt. It happened that I met him at one of Parker's Sunday evenings at home. I soon felt that this was not the man for whom I had cherished so great a distaste. Gentle and unassuming in manner, with a pleasant voice, a benevolent countenance, and a sort of glory of sincerity in his ways and words, I could only wonder at the falsehoods that I had heard and believed, concerning him."

"Lead us not into Temptation."

Remember that in this prayer you are speaking to God, who is our Father. There have to be temptations in our life, while we are learning the difference between right and wrong, and we grow strong and faithful by overcoming them, by fighting down our bad tempers, by keeping back angry words, by holding bravely to truth, when it costs us a good deal, by patiently and fearlessly doing what we know is right. And it helps us, when we remember that this is always our Father's will. He is never on the side of the evil, but always on the side of righteousness. We must never think that He is tempting us to do wrong. He gives us the trial, but His will is that we should overcome the temptation and do what is right. So I think this prayer, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," is like putting our hand into His in the time of trial, and asking His help, remembering that He wishes us to conquer. It is as though we said: "Father, let us feel that Thou art leading us, but not into temptation, for Thou canst never tempt us to do wrong. Thy will is against all evil; let this evil thing now be no temptation to us, but as Thy children let us love and hold to the right, that so we may be delivered from the evil!" When we truly pray like that, giving ourselves up to do our Father's will, we must surely get the victory.

But by ourselves, we know how weak we are, and how often we have given way to temptation. We forgot that our Father was with us, and that in the love of goodness, which is His will, we must overcome the evil. So for us it is natural and right to keep out of temptation, to keep away, as far as we can, from what we know is evil. If we pray not to be led into temptation, that is what we must do for ourselves. When our duty is clear, we must not be afraid to do it, even in the face of danger. But it is foolish and wrong to run into danger, when there is no need. Trials come, which cannot be avoided, and then we have to keep fast hold of our Father's hand—that is, holding with all our might to the love of what is right and good, ready to suffer for it, because it is best, determined to do our duty, which is our Father's will. But where it is not the clear way of our duty, we ought to avoid, as far as we can, having to do with evil things.

It is far better to fill our minds with healthy and good thoughts, so that we learn to love pure and beautiful things more and more, and to be so occupied in doing kind and honest things that we have no time for what is mean and ill-tempered. You know, every one of you, where your own weakness lies, where you most easily stumble into faults or give way to passion that you are ashamed of afterwards; and so you can make this prayer very real by avoiding your special dangers, and keeping near to what helps you most to be brave and true. Choose good friends is one of the best rules for us all. If you meet with companions whom you feel to be unworthy, who tempt you to do wrong and laugh at your scruples, do not be led by them. It is best to keep out of their way. If in any of your walks you pass a place where there is a foul and sickening smell, you never go that way again if you can help it. There is poison in the air, from a bad drain, or some other cause, and you know it is dangerous to be there. So it is with people who use bad words, and put evil thoughts into your mind. Keep out of their way, or if you have to be near them, hold fast to your Father's hand, in the love of what is pure and good. It is the same with books, as with people, you sometimes begin to read a book that you feel to be unwholesome. Then stop at once and put it away. There is never time to read all the good and delightful books, and it is waste of time and far worse than that to linger over what is foul and unwholesome.

Keep out of temptation yourself, and whatever you do, be careful not to lead others into temptation. Remember how quickly the little ones imitate what you do, and repeat your words. We sometimes begin to be ashamed of ourselves only when we see a little child imitating our bad habits. Choose good friends, I said just now; but it is even more important to be a good friend, whom it may be helpful and pleasant for others to be with. The little ones so easily catch your expressions of bad temper, or impatience, in looks as well as words. It is like an illness that may spread through a whole family. Then don't begin to infect the others in that way, but let the sunshine of good temper be in your face because it is in your heart, and let truth and gentleness and unselfishness rule in your life, and the love of pure and beautiful things; then you will be doing your very best that others may not be led into temptation.

So we can make our own prayer real, and the more we do that, the more sure we are that our Father's will is always on the side of what is right and good, and that He helps us and delivers us from all evil.

Those of you who read the Revised Version of the New Testament have, perhaps, been puzzled to find "the evil one" in this sentence of the prayer, and the simple word "evil," which we rightly use in the prayer, put into the margin. It is a great pity that change was made in the translation, because the thought of "the evil one," as a person different from men, sometimes called Satan or the Devil, is no part of our religion. It is wrong and cruel to frighten little children with any such thought—it is like a bad dream of the old time, and is not true. The word in the Lord's Prayer need not be translated so, and it is far better to keep to the thought that the evil is in our own hearts, when we give way to temptation and do wrong. It is we ourselves who do the wrong, but with our Father's help we learn to do right, and so are delivered from evil.

Then at the end of the prayer come the words: "For Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory, for ever and ever, Amen." Those words seem to have been added afterwards, when the disciples began to use the Lord's Prayer. They help to remind us that all our life is in our Father's hands. And at the very end we say Amen. That means, Verily. It is like saying, "Yes, indeed, we do mean every word that we have said in the prayer." If we honestly say Amen, then we know what we must be doing, to make it a real prayer in our life.

We're not all put together alike, and we may misjudge one another.—George Eliot.

THE NEGLECTED POOR.

We published last week a letter from the secretary of the Manchester Domestic Mission drawing attention to an appeal which has been issued to the churches of the district asking for a substantial addition to the annual income of the society, which sustains the work of two missions among the very poor in the heart of the city of Manchester. The committee ask for an additional income of £150, and with deep regret have come to the decision that unless a sufficient response is made to their appeal they must next year either close one of the missions or ask the missionaries to continue their ever-increasing work on a smaller salary. It is impossible to doubt that when this is clearly understood among the churches of the district the needful response will be quickly made.

The Manchester Domestic Mission was one of the earliest to be established in this country, with London leading the way, and quickly followed by Liverpool, Bristol, Leeds and Birmingham. The new impulse of religious earnestness and of practical concern for the neglected poor of our great cities had come in the first instance from Dr. Tuckerman of Boston, Channing's friend, and among those who responded most ardently to the appeal of his example and his earnest advocacy of the work, when he came to this country, were Mary Carpenter, James Martineau and John Hamilton Thom. Looking back sixty years afterwards to Tuckerman's visit, in company with his friend Jonathan Phillips, Dr. Martineau wrote:—

I know not whether the warm welcome they received, especially at Mr. Rathbone's, of Greenbank—that house of refuge of all the saints—set their hearts aglow; but certain it is that their benevolent and devout enthusiasm came upon us like the Angel descending to stir the sleeping waters; and their recital of what was being done to uplift and evangelise the neglected classes in Boston fell as a convicting and converting word, and yet a word of hope and zeal, upon our conscience, and not least on that of Mr. Thom.

Mr. Thom's prompt zeal on behalf of these institutions for home visitation was no mere flash of response to Dr. Tuckerman's benign personality and persuasive enthusiasm, but a life-long Christ-like conviction, again and again expressed with a fervour and freshness which mark him off as a Heaven-appointed messenger of hope to the wanderers that have lost their way. Never are his words more solemn, penetrating, and tender, than when they urge the extension or celebrate the persistence of this work.

And Dr. Martineau himself was no less earnest and constant in his pleading for what he regarded as a paramount duty of Christian discipleship laid upon the churches. "We acknowledge," he once said, "with all Christendom, that the missionary spirit is inseparable from the religious life, and that it is impossible for a people to train themselves in the school of Christ, yet remain quiet neighbours to the victims of passion, ignorance, and wrong. Where there is no sorrow felt for those to whom God is dead and the heavens are dark, no pity for those whose life is a flight from pursuing Fate into the grim arms of 'the last enemy,' no longing to seek and to save the lost, how can there be either love of God or 'enthusiasm of humanity'? No Christian society gives any adequate expression of its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood; and it is but a selfish membership that looks coldly on such evangelising work." The equipment of special mission stations, he then urged, must not be deemed sufficient, since every church in its own neighbourhood must be the centre of such active beneficence; and yet, with special emphasis, we may take those words as pointing to the obligation laid upon the churches in the neighbourhood of a great city, to see to it that, so far as they can compass it, there shall be no desolate regions into which some message of hope and Christian sympathy does not penetrate.

As a religious community we have not seen our duty in such a light as to be fired with a passion for Foreign Missions, but all the more must we be careful that the appeal for self-sacrifice in going forth to seek and to save is not neglected, and the opportunity of giving abundantly, for rich and poor alike according to their means, with a noble and sustained enthusiasm, is not denied to the members of our churches. No appeal, when it is rightly made, is more heart-searching than this, for patient and generous support of Domestic Missions. They send faithful men to befriend the most friendless, to go to the heart of the most pathetic wretchedness, which is hidden in the midst of our abundance and the fair show of our wealthy Christianity, and to gather about the homes of humble faith and worship they establish in the poorest quarters of our cities a number of beneficent activities, caring for the children, sustaining the tempted, lifting up the fallen, carrying brightness and healthy influences into the most unlovely places, and with the unaffected friendliness and devoted service of many helpers bearing witness to despairing hearts of the sincerity of Christian love and compassion, in which, more than by any other means, the love of God is made manifest to men. Happy, indeed, are they who by personal service are able to take some part in this work, and thus in the deepest sense come to know the blessedness of giving; but even where that is not possible, every faithful and compassionate heart may have the true joy of unselfish giving, not with impatience to be rid of an importunate appeal, but with a clear sense of loving sympathy for the most wretched, with a true stretching out of a brotherly hand, even in the humblest gift, which means self-sacrifice, in furnishing the means that shall worthily sustain this work. For the true health of our churches, no less than for the sake of those who must be helped, the support of these Domestic Missions must not be left to a few wealthy friends. It must be felt as a sacred obligation laid on all alike, and it is a wrong done to the humbler members of our churches when the character of the work and the need for help is not clearly laid before them, and their help invited.

We have referred specially to the Manchester Domestic Mission because of the urgent need that has been brought to our notice, and we may, perhaps, be allowed a word of direct sympathy and appeal to the churches of that district. Quite recently a new interest in the work of the Mission has been shown by the appointment of representatives of congregations on the Committee, and local treasurers who gather up the subscriptions of their congregations. A few congregations also have collections. We cannot doubt that if the need were clearly and earnestly made known to every congregation in the district there would be the warm response, for which the Committee of the Mission have rightly asked, from those who can only give small amounts. There are many who would gladly give their mite to a collection for such a purpose, or in answer to the personal request of some member specially appointed to collect such gifts. But whatever method is preferred, the appeal ought surely to be made and pressed home to the heart and conscience of each one. This work began in the truest spirit of Christian discipleship, and it has been sustained in the past with a noble generosity and patient continuance in well-doing. We are confident that the same spirit is now in the hearts of many of our people, who have not yet realised what is asked of them, but who, when they see the need and their own opportunity, will earnestly and thankfully come forward to do their part.

THE PULPIT.

SHAKESPEARE'S "TEMPEST."

BY THE REV. E. I. FRIPP.*

"Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."—Rom. xii. 21.

Some time ago, in a sermon on the educational and religious function of the drama, I said that the great poet, in so far as he is great, is a seer—that he sees below the surface tendencies of things, and proclaims, in a manner that enforces attention, the deep spiritual beauty of the world. I said that, as the prophet beholds and declares the law of righteousness, which, in spite of folly and sin and depravity, governs human life, so the great poet, such as Shakespeare or Dante, feels, and by his art makes felt, the spirit of love and beauty which, beneath all that is commonplace and selfish and sordid and hideous in society, rejoices the heart of man. And I illustrated this by the Midsummer Night's Dream. I tried to show that the Dream was the poet's plea for his art—his plea for the wonder and mystery and loveliness and kindness which fill the universe, and his protest against the dulness and materialism and self-complacency and petty selfishness which too often blind our eyes. He takes quarrelling lovers, and setting them in a forest, makes them the sport of merry spirits, whose mischief, running riot, nevertheless unravels the tangled threads of their contention and brings all to happiness; and he places Bully Bottom, the type for all time of the British Philistine, in the midst of fairyland, giving him, as he deserves, an ass's head. So young Shakespeare, in the exuberance of his early strength and joyousness, laughs at our foolish jealousies and thick skulls, and bids us open our minds to the infinite fairy world of God's creation and the gentle spirit of loving-kindness that pervades it.

This evening I want to speak of another play of Shakespeare, which has a peculiar and most interesting connection with the Midsummer Night's Dream, and which in the same delightful way, flinging mere superficial realities to the four winds, brings us down to the fundamental truths of existence, and emphasises the supremacy, in all human relationships, of love—only with deeper and grander effect as the work of the poet's riper genius. The Tempest was written some fifteen or twenty years after the Dream, and was probably Shakespeare's farewell to the stage. We see in it the same yet a different Shakespeare. His Dream is of Charlcote woods, and its fairies who dance in the moonlight and sport with wrangling youths and maids. In The Tempest he takes us to an enchanted island in the midst of the sea, and shows us man no longer young, no longer the plaything of the supernatural, but old and experienced and learned, a great magician, with robe and wand and books of sorcery, knowing the decrees of fortune, the influence of the stars, the properties of herbs, master of the spirits of the air and earth, controlling the winds and tides and the thunder, and, by a deeper magic, controlling the varied stormy elements of human nature—envy, mockery, sensuality, drunkenness, cruelty, and murder—and changing them through pain and sorrow to good, and producing at length harmony, and a deep, beautiful calm. The poet's fancy is here more spiritual, and has a more solemn background. He himself is older, with a profounder knowledge of the good and ill of life, and a stronger grasp of the conditions of human welfare. And he looks forward to peace, the peace of love, among his children and old friends and neighbours at Stratford, and to peace—the peace of a greater love—beyond this world of shadows.

The central thought of the poem is love—the magic of love to reconcile and heal, and redeem and bless.

Suppose a man to have been wronged to the uttermost, to have been treacherously deprived of his estate by his friends and relatives, and sent adrift with his only child, three years old, in a rotten boat to perish; suppose him, by almost a miracle, to come to land on a desert island, and to live there for twelve years in loneliness; and then his enemies are suddenly brought within his reach, and are at his mercy; what will he do? Will he not be tempted to have revenge? Further, suppose his fate has been partly his own fault; suppose he lost his kingdom, as Hamlet lost his, by allowing, through attention to books when he ought to have been busy with affairs of State, villainy to get a footing in the land and to seize the throne? Suppose, too, he has his books, as well as his daughter, with him in his exile, and has uninterrupted leisure for knowledge. May he not be tempted to sulk on his island? to say, as Timon did, "I have done with the world!" or at least to play the cynic with Jaques, and exclaim, "Thank God, here I am by myself, free from human envy and folly! I am happy without my fellow creatures; I will keep my learning to myself and leave men in their ignorance." People who have been wronged are not unfrequently of this temper. But this is exactly the disposition Shakespeare condemns. Prospero is in the two-fold state I have described. He has been wickedly ill-used. Yet he has his child, his books, and leisure for study, power over the elements, knowledge of supernatural agencies. He, himself, is almost a god. But he needs one thing. He wants his fellow-men. He wants human fellowship. He is not satisfied with knowledge. He is weary of solitary culture. He is tired of himself. He desires to return to work and duty in the old sinful world. In spite of all its evil, its uncharitableness, its injustice, its failures, its vanities, he will go back to it. Notwithstanding the wickedness of men, he cannot do without them. And, therefore, when the usurping brother's ship is thrown into his power he employs his magic, not for vengeance, but for reconciliation, not to plague and torture his enemies, but to change them, to bring them to their senses, and to lead them through suffering to regret and a new life, to make them no longer foes but friends. For the tempest which Prospero raises up is one of those of which Shakespeare says elsewhere, "Tempests are kind, and salt waves fresh in love." It brings kindness out of hate, and love from enmity. Firstly, it does good by treating with contempt the artificial distinctions of rank and wealth which are the source of so much of the world's uncharitableness. The storm is no respecter of persons. The boatswain has no time to consider worldly dignities. He has to save the ship, and kings and nobles must get out of his way. Face to face with nature and the fierce elements and death, all men are men, and all men are brothers. That is the first lesson Alonzo learns when he is tumbled below by the sailors. Next he learns grief. His son, he believes, is drowned. Then he is plotted against by his confederates, and with them is dragged about the island until footsore and ready to drop with weariness. Worn out, they are further tormented by the sight of a rich feast, which vanishes as they put out their hands to take it, and at last are driven desperate by awful voices convincing them "like poison" of their sin. But there their troubles end. Prospero's anger goes at the first sign of penitence. "They being penitent," he says, "the sole drift of my purpose doth extend not a frown further." He draws them into his magic ring of fellowship, calls them and the mariners "friends all"; and in the last words of the play before the fall of the curtain—the last words spoken by Shakespeare from the stage to his contemporaries—he would have them come closer yet, rich and poor, old friends, and former enemies, "Please you, draw near." And not even Stephano and Trinculo and Caliban are forgotten. They are led through the mire, drenched to the skin, chased, as lower than beasts, by hounds, and wracked with cramps; but in the end they are admitted into an outer circle of fellowship. Thus the uproar and tumult with which the play began, the uproar and tumult of human passion, gradually sinks down and passes into harmony, into music deeper and deeper and more beautiful, and, under the spell of the magician, there is "a sea-change into something rich and strange."

That is the central thought of the poem. With it is skilfully blended the kindred thought of the liberty of love. "There is no magic," he tells us, "like love"; and in telling us that, he tells us also that there is no freedom except in love. Men have various ideas of liberty, true and false, and many of these are represented. There is the freedom Ariel pants after. Ariel, as his name suggests, lives and moves and has his being in the sunny air. He is not like Puck, a goblin of the night, who "follows the darkness round the world" and rejoices in men's homes and fire-sides. His element is in the light, and he shuns contact with rude humanity. He is pure innocence, a little joyous singing creature, whose idea of happiness is that of the bird or the insect. He loves the breeze, the bright clouds and the spray. He would be free as the mountain wind, to float at will over the bright world, to fly ever after the summer on a bat's back merrily, or to ride to shore laughing on the top of a wave, and then to rest, as he sings in his song of liberty, where the bee sucks in a cowslip's bell or under the blossom on the bough. In contrast to this is Caliban's notion of freedom. Cali-

* A sermon preached in All Souls' Church, Belfast, Jan. 14.

ban, whose name is an anagram for Canibal, is just the opposite to Ariel. He is of the earth, earthy—heavy, slow, and carnal. We hear him before we see him, and between his grunt and his appearance Ariel has time to come and go again. He is gross, lazy flesh. He hates work. He likes to gather nuts and rob bird's nests, to snare and torture animals, to drink from the wild stream, or, when he can get it, the celestial liquor of Stephano's bottle, to lie on his belly in the cool slush and munch filberts and berries. He is always chewing or guzzling. He would have no master. If he could have his will he would brain Prospero, or, in Calibanish speech, "with a log batter his skull, or paunch him with a stake, or cut his wizand with [a] knife." And he too, when intoxicated, can sing of liberty—the song of the Anarchist:—

Flout 'em and scout 'em,
And scout 'em and flout 'em;
Thought is free.

Then in contrast to these conceptions of freedom, neither of which is human, is the true liberty of love in Ferdinand and Miranda, the liberty of a loving bondage and a loving service. Miranda is as much nobler than Ariel as Ferdinand than Caliban. Ariel knows no sin, but he cannot love and cannot pray. Miranda is all pity and reverence. She is pure, uncorrupted human nature; her affection and conscience just awake, shrinking from all thought of evil. She turns away her face at her father's recital of his wrongs. It is too painful to listen to. And when she sees Ferdinand she loves him with a holy passion. As Juliet and Romeo meet first as saint and pilgrim and are infinitely wonderful and sacred to each other, so Miranda and Ferdinand are to one another as "things divine." When Prospero brings the son of his enemy to shore and welcomes him in Ariel's song with the homely sounds of the cock and the watchdog—symbols in Elizbethan poetry of the peace and love of home—and Ferdinand, following the mysterious voices, looks up in wonder and worship and says, "This is no mortal business," Miranda seeing him, young and beautiful with a look of prayer upon his countenance, asks "Is it a spirit?" And he, seeing her, says "It is a goddess!" Then their childlike love deepens. It is made stronger by adversity. Ferdinand is put in bonds and compelled to fetch and stack the wood at Prospero's cave. He does Caliban's work. But no matter. He does it cheerfully. For love, the king's son, as he always will, does service which the slave disdains. He toils at a task he would once have thought heavy and mean. For now, he says—

The mistress which I serve quickens what's dead
And makes my labours pleasures.

Miranda weeps to see him and would help him. "You look wearily," she says. But he answers, "No, 'tis fresh morning with me when you are by." This is not bondage. He says:

Might I but through my prison once a day
Behold this maid, all corners else o' the earth
Let liberty make use of, space enough
Have I."

It is freedom—akin to that of which we speak when we say in our prayers "Thy service is perfect freedom." Therefore at the wedding, Venus, the goddess of false free-love, the mistress of misrule and licence and lust, is absent; and, instead, Juno and Ceres, queens of heaven and the land, leading in a train of naiads and sunburnt reapers, types of temperance and honest toil, pronounce the blessing. And after marriage, when the test of true love begins, the young husband and wife are seen at the mouth of the cave playing chess—the old Teutonic game which in ancient poetry is the symbol of the game of life—opposing skill to skill, and mind to mind, each in the exercise of its power, but with love at each end directing the moves and making the contest a happiness. Thus in our homes and families, and in public life, by the loving toleration of opinion and method, and encouragement of one another's powers, are we free, and only thus are we free.

Lastly, there is the freedom of Prospero. Give him an island all to himself, make him monarch of all he surveys; yet he is not free. Let him have all knowledge, let him control the powers of the air and the earth; yet he has not freedom. He cannot be free away from his fellow creatures—without duty and responsibility, and love and service. For freedom he must do his work in the world, bravely and kindly. He must take men as they are, with their faults and peculiarities and prejudices, and do the best he can as one of them, as part himself of faulty, peculiar and prejudiced humanity, to make the world a little better than he found it. And for that Prospero will put away his magic robe and break his staff and drown his book, and return, as a man, to his fellowmen, content with the one divine magic—the magic of love.

Such, as it seems to me, are the leading thoughts of this wonderful poem. And now I pass, for a few minutes, to the striking personal element in the play. I do not doubt that in Prospero we have to a certain degree an embodiment of Shakespeare's own ripe wisdom, and that the magician's resignation of his enchantment and farewell to his island are the poet's close of his career as a player and his "good-bye" to London. If this is so—and it is not at all inconsistent with the fact that Shakespeare probably wrote later plays at Stratford: he would have written more still had he lived—it makes the character doubly significant and the play doubly beautiful. And it gives special meaning to Prospero's fine speech on the transitoriness of life and the world, and the long sleep before the Judgment Day. He says to Ferdinand, just married to his daughter, feeling as many a man may—and as Shakespeare himself might—when his children marry and his work for them is finished, that the next family event will be his own funeral,—

These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
Are melted into air, into thin air:
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made on; and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep. Sir, I am vex'd;
Bear with my weakness; my old brain is troubled:
Be not disturbed with my infirmity:
If you be pleased, retire into my cell,
And there repose: a turn or two I'll walk
To still my beating mind.

There is no reason whatever to interpret this passage to mean that Shakespeare did not believe in immortality. It is simply, in noblest verse, the old Christian doctrine of the littleness and swiftness of life, and the sleep before and after it of the womb and the grave; and I read in it the truth so poetically suggested in the Midsummer Night's Dream only deeper and more solemn, that life is a vision and the universe a realm of shadows, and beyond these is the great Reality. In his last play at the Globe, bidding farewell to his beloved art, to his theatre, to his comrades, to his public, to find rest and freedom among old friends and dear ones at Stratford, he feels something of the infirmity of age, and his brain reels at the vast mystery of life and death; but his sympathetic nature is brimful of love and mercy and forgiveness, and he puts his trust in the Eternal.

Oh, how great is Shakespeare! How fine is his dramatic skill, his power of bringing together, as in this play, such varied human elements into one little place and time; how matchless his humour, how magnificent his common-sense, how sublime his charity! And, also, how deep, how profound is his religiousness, without which, however great in every other respect, he would not be the greatest of all.

THE LATE DR. MARTINEAU.

Sir,—The Committee of Manchester College, Oxford, have collected a considerable number of printed tributes to the memory of the late Dr. Martineau, and intend to have them placed in the College Library. It will be an interesting addition to this collection if the Committee could place with it a gathering of the memorial sermons, which have no doubt been preached in very many places, and which will have given a varied expression of appreciation of our revered teacher and leader.

The Committee of the College have honoured me with the duty of preparing the memorial volumes, and I shall be very grateful to the friends who will help me in my work by sending me either printed or MS. copies of their discourses to the address below for insertion in the collection.

THE UNITED BRETHREN.

Sir,—In his notice of my "Record of the United Brethren of Devon and Cornwall" in your columns, Mr. Burgess suggests that it would have been well if the Assembly had authorised me to print their minutes and records in full. Such a publication would have been of great interest to antiquarians and students, though perhaps tedious to the ordinary reader, if the minutes was given in their entirety; and the cost would have gone beyond any sum which the Assembly could readily find for the purpose. There is, further, one at present insuperable difficulty in the way of any satisfactory work of the kind—namely, that some of the original records have been lost quite recently, and for my essay I had to rely on notes and transcripts made by the Rev. J. E. Odgers and others. In 1852 the Assembly resolved that all its documents, excepting the current minute book, should be placed in the hands of the treasurer. Since then they have been consulted by Mr. Odgers, and some of them were copied by R. N. Worth, F.G.S., for the Devon Association meeting in 1877, who borrowed them from Mr. Hill, of Moretonhampstead. Surely valuable records of Nonconformity which existed, and were accessible about twenty years ago, ought to be traceable now. I shall be glad if this letter leads to the careful examination of old books and papers of any who might possibly have them in their possession. In my publication I have, as far as possible, made use of the actual words of the original documents and so let them tell the story, which should therefore be interesting to any who desire information about English Nonconformity.

BACK TO JESUS.

Sir,—I thank Mr. Lloyd Thomas for his interesting letter. As he is silent about my contention that the personality of Jesus must necessarily be conceived of subjectively and ideally, such conception varying in different minds, I presume he agrees with that view. His dictum that "The Christian Church is the perpetuation of the Person of Christ" is therefore perplexing, seeing that even, taking the term "Christian Church" to mean only those who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity, the combination of their multitudinous conceptions of Jesus can only result in a still more purely ideal personage, not in the real Jesus of Nazareth. As the vast majority of its members regard Jesus as Almighty God, we are landed in a curious dilemma, as it then becomes the perpetuation of a conception we do not accept as true. I am not sure that Pusey House has not the best of it. Space forbids my touching on the other interesting speculations suggested by Mr. Thomas.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir,—I have read Mr. Robinson's letter in your last issue, and so far as I am concerned will now close the correspondence in the briefest possible way. I am personally averse from controversy, but was forced into it in this case through the violent and reckless attack on the honour of our country contained in the Review of Mr. Bryce's book, which wounded me more deeply than it would be proper, in your columns, to describe.

With reference to Mr. Robinson's remarks on the criticism of the Franchise Law of July last, I can but say that, as I am not a believer in the doctrine of the utter depravity of all Johannisbergers, I accept the "analytical criticism" of "a well-known lawyer" in that city in preference to the views of any one resident here. If any of your readers desire to form an opinion for themselves, they can obtain a copy of the Blue Book (C. 9518) from the Queen's printers for a few pence.

As to "religious opinion," I never dreamt of claiming any superiority for the opinions of religious bodies on politics to those of others—rather the reverse. But I considered it remarkable that such bodies who should primâ facie be least inclined for war, are in South Africa practically unanimous, in this case, as to its necessity. Quite recently the Presbyterian ministers at Capetown came into line with the others, and passed a resolution calling upon their co-religionists throughout the Empire to support the Imperial Government (Christian World, Feb. 2, p. 2). How different is this from the fatuous manifesto signed by many of our ministers. This does not make for peace, but encourages the Boers to continue the war, and tends to the repetition of another Majuba Hill mistake, on a colossal scale, after the lapse of a few years.

James Shield.

Liverpool, Feb. 28.

Sir,—Will you allow me to say that it appears to me unfortunate that you should have opened your columns to a discussion as to the justness or otherwise of the present war. The question seems to be more or less one of party politics, and more fitted for discussion in the daily and weekly political papers than in "a journal of religious thought and life." No doubt the topic is one of absorbing interest at present, but surely there are more pleasant and non-controversial aspects of it to which discussions in your paper—which should make for peace and harmony among its readers—might be confined.

I suppose those who are in the most unfortunate position of believing their country to be in the wrong in this quarrel, do not wish to stop the war at this present juncture, nor desire that our countrymen, who are enduring hardships and fighting for us at the front—most of whom have had no option in the matter—should lose heart or suffer defeat. Is it likely to assist them in their efforts if papers, which may be sent for their perusal, contain letters and statements to the effect that the cause for which they are fighting is an unjust one? Those who live quietly at home should remember what they seem to forget—that in the present state of civilisation over the world they are only enabled to do so by others being prepared to fight for them.

The spirit which prompted the memorial of our ministers to Lord Salisbury set out in your last issue is admirable, but the deplorable wording of it will, it is to be feared, cause it to have not the slightest result. I am glad to see that the same issue contains expressions of dissent from it on the part of one who would not sign.

At the risk of being called inconsistent, might I be allowed to ask a lady who writes to you this week and talks of the "mad and brutal passions let loose on the battlefield, which make every engagement a hell," if, so far as the conduct of British officers and soldiers in this present war is concerned, she is speaking from imagination or from knowledge of facts?

And with regard to future feelings between the races, does not our experience go to show, that men who have met each other in physical or intellectual contests and both fought well, agree together better afterwards, than men do who have not tested their respective merits, and one of whom from ignorance despises the other—which apparently was the case with Boer and Briton before the war began?

Feb. 26. Edward Bramley.

[We cannot at all agree with our correspondent that the justice or injustice of the war is a question of party politics. Our religion surely must be concerned with such a question of national righteousness and the honour of our country, and we cannot see that a religious newspaper has any right to be silent, differ as its readers may on points at issue.—Ed. Inq.]

Sir,—No one will question the motives of the 150 ministers who have been memorialising the Marquis of Salisbury or do otherwise than very warmly sympathise with their desire that the terrible drama, now being enacted in South Africa, should be closed at the earliest possible moment.

Surely, though, it is impossible for our Government to move, in the way urged, at present. What are the facts? The two Republics secretly combined together to make war against us at a moment's notice; they addressed to us an ultimatum, couched in such extravagant terms as to render further negotiation impossible; they invaded our colonies within twenty-four hours, determined to take full advantage of their defenceless state; they annexed our territory, and still have in their grip large tracts of our country, including several towns; they hold numbers of our troops as prisoners; they have neglected no means to sap the loyalty of our fellow-subjects; they have commandeered them and despoiled them of their property; yet now, almost before we have been able to bring our resources to bear, and whilst the crisis is at its height, the Government is pressed to make overtures for an armistice! Could any course be less likely to lead to a final and satisfactory settlement of the great questions at issue in South Africa?

What do the memorialists mean by such terms as "the integrity of British territory" and "British residents in the Transvaal"? As used, they seem a covert admission that we are in the wrong, and that we ought to be contented to revert to the position as it was before the war. Can it be seriously supposed that, after the vast sacrifices the Empire has made both of life and treasure, we shall forego the natural fruits flowing from the war? Suppose the Government were to meditate such a course, would Parliament permit it to be carried out? What, also, of the Army and of our Canadian, Australian and New Zealand brethren? What of the loyal part of the population in South Africa itself? These questions answer themselves, and make any settlement on the lines suggested by the Memorial impossible.

When once the ultimate success of our arms is clearly established and manifest in the eyes of the world, it might be practical and wise to state our terms of peace; but such a step must rest with the Government, who, alone, can know whether or not it was likely to be useful.

Some things must certainly be assured; a citizen of the Empire must no longer be a stranger or an alien, either in the Transvaal or the Orange Free State, and the States themselves must, once for all, come into the sphere of British influence.

Nottingham, Feb. 26. B. Dowson.

Sir,—I shall be grateful if you will allow me to express in your columns an entire sympathy with the letter of Mr. Shaen Solly, published last week. I am one of many to whom it has been a matter of the deepest regret that the memorial to the Prime Minister, printed by you last week, should go forth either to the Government or the public as representing either the ethical or political judgment of our body on the present war.

The war is either just or unjust. If the memorialists regard it as just, their memorial is obviously futile and unnecessary. They ask the Government to take the earliest available opportunity to make peace. In the case of a just war that opportunity does not come until the conflict has been brought to a successful issue either by the defeat, or the repentance, of the unjust adversary. No Government waging such a war needs to be memorialised to seize this opportunity when it comes: its coming is what they have been fighting for. To present memorials in favour of peace is, in such a case, merely as though the horrified spectator of some surgical operation should beseech the surgeon to desist from the use of the knife. This he will do of his own accord at the proper moment—that is, when the operation is complete. To desist before would be criminal.

Noting the names of the memorialists, I cannot believe that they would be parties to such a feeble and insignificant proceeding as that of petitioning the Government to take "the earliest available opportunity" to stop a just war. I am bound to infer, therefore, that one and all they regard the war as unjust, the only supposition on which it is conceivable that thoughtful men should make such a petition. For those who hold that view, nothing of course is more natural or right than that they should appeal to the Government to stop the war; but even so, it seems to me that the moment chosen for making the appeal could not have been more inopportune. At the time when the memorial was sent round for signature, our armies were everywhere defeated or ineffective, and the only possible way for our Government to end the conflict was by asking for and accepting the Boers' terms of peace. On the absolute certainty that no British Government, of whatever party, would do anything of the kind I will not dwell; nor need a word be said of the total ruin to our prestige, for that is not an ethical consideration; it is enough that, as Mr. Solly clearly shows, the granting of the appeal would have made the recurrence of the war certain. As one who does not accept the view that the war is unjust, I could not have signed the memorial in any case. But had I been of the opposite opinion I should have been equally reluctant to sign. It would then have seemed to me that the memorial lost all its force through containing no clear indication of the attitude of mind adopted by the memorialists. That can only be ethical condemnation of the war as such. Unless this is made clear the document is meaningless, and one which, while it does not improve the reputation of our ministry for moral earnestness, will injure that for common sense. It would have been made clear if the phrase had been retained which, in the first issued draft of the memorial, spoke of the war as "a scandal to our common Christianity." About that there could be no mistake.

L. P. Jacks.

Birmingham, Feb. 28.

Sir,—As one of those responsible for the issue of the Memorial to Lord Salisbury, may I be allowed a few words in reply to the courteous letter of Mr. Shaen Solly.

Mr. Solly explains that he was unable to sign the Memorial because it failed to insist on the "necessity of securing disarmament in South Africa," by which, I presume, Mr. Solly means the disarmament of the Boers.

May I point out that what the Memorial does is to urge upon the Government, through Lord Salisbury, that they should avail themselves of the earliest opportunity to prepare the way for "an effective and enduring peace on such terms that while justice should be done to British subjects it should be made manifest to the world that the British Government is animated by no spirit of revenge, and seeks neither goldfields nor territory; but desires, above all things, relations of kindness and goodwill between the English and Dutch races in South Africa." How that peace is to be attained, or how it is to be made effective and enduring, the memorialists do not presume to say. What they do is to indicate the end which they desire, and the spirit in which, as they believe, that end should be pursued.

With that aim and with that spirit I cannot but believe that Mr. Solly is in heartiest sympathy. I think, therefore, we might fairly ask for his name to the Memorial.

With the closing paragraph of Mr. Solly's letter I sincerely regret to find myself sadly at variance. I also have read Mr. Bryce's "Impressions or South Africa" and much besides, and the conclusion to which I have sorrowfully come is: that it is not the Boers, but the British—or, more correctly, the representatives of Britain—who have "committed one of the most wicked acts recorded in history," and that whatever the immediate issues of the present strife may be, judgment and penalty must inevitably follow. John Byles.

Northampton, Feb. 26.

Action seems to follow feeling, but really action and feeling go together; and by regulating the action, which is under the more direct control of the will, we can indirectly regulate the feeling, which is not. Thus, the sovereign voluntary path to cheerfulness, if our spontaneous cheerfulness be lost, is to sit up cheerfully, to look round cheerfully, and to act and speak as if cheerfulness were already there. If such conduct does not make you soon feel cheerful nothing else on that occasion can. So to feel brave, act as if we were brave, use all our will to that end and a courage-fit will very likely replace the fit of fear. To wrestle with a bad feeling only pins our attention on it, and keeps it still fastened in the mind, whereas, if we act as if from some better feeling the old, bad feeling soon folds its tent like an Arab, and silently steals away. — William James.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON AND THE SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

That which is now absorbing the attention and interest of the Churches within the metropolitan area is the near approach of the London Bazaar, which is to consummate the achievement of raising £12,000 to form a Permanent Chapel Building Fund and to extinguish existing debts on church buildings. The friends of this movement have been working hard and very enthusiastically for several months, determined, if possible, to make the Bazaar a great success. The churches have been brought into closer touch with each other, and the bond of union, which had hitherto existed to a large extent in name, has become more of a reality. The list of donations published from time to time shows that there are some large hearts still in our ranks, who feel it a privilege to help forward the spread of liberal religion. Over £9,000 has already been promised, and we are sanguine enough to believe that at least £10,000 will be raised before May 1. The needs of London are always growing, for, on every hand, new suburbs are springing up, where an increasing population is glad to find a home, and unless we are prepared to go forward and take possession of the land, we shall find ourselves in the rear of the great army of religious workers, although we profess to be in the van of religious progress. The smaller churches need strengthening, and those that are located in neighbourhoods where it is impossible for them to maintain the position unaided, must have generous assistance from without, while the newly established churches require to be fostered until they can safely stand alone. For all this work a largely increased income of the London District Society is required, and if the members of the different London churches only realised their responsibility in this matter, the financial problem would soon be solved.

New ground has been broken at Sydenham. Two series of Sunday evening services have been held in the new Public Hall. The attendances at the commencement were of a very encouraging character, but lately, in common with other churches, we have had to contend with wind and rain, sleet and snow, which are not genial friends of religious services. As many as 110 were present on one occasion, and as few as 18 on another; but when atmospheric conditions were favourable, the congregation numbered about 50. Of course many have come from mere curiosity, to know what strange things Unitarians have to bring to their ears, and then go their own way with a few fresh thoughts stirring in their minds. There were others who are convinced that we have truth on our side, and are in sympathy with us, but social and other considerations prevent them from publicly identifying themselves with any movement which is outside the pale of orthodoxy. However, we have done our best to sow the seeds of truth, and must leave results to the good husbandry of God. If we have only set people thinking on religious questions, we have accomplished something. We are not afraid of thinking people, like Romanists and Anglicans. They do not wish people to think on religious matters. As a priest once said to a friend: "You have no idea how troublesome people are who do think. It makes dissenters of them and all sorts of things." There is no doubt it makes Unitarians of them. On ten Sunday evenings different aspects of Unitarian teaching have been presented, and a strong desire has been expressed that a further effort should be made to gather into closer fellowship those who are seeking a rational religion. Arrangements have accordingly been made to continue the services until the end of March, when it is hoped there may be some definite indication as to future action.

Passing now from London into the South Eastern Counties, we have to record a few ministerial changes. Brighton has lost the Rev. A. Hood, who for several years ministered to the Free Christian Church in New-road, and who took an active part in the social movements of the town. On account of continued ill-health he was obliged to resign the pastorate in the autumn of last year. He received from the congregation very substantial proofs of their affection and esteem, and it is hoped that his residence for a time in a more genial clime will prove beneficial to his health. There is a wide field at Brighton for the energy and devotion of an earnest minister, and every opportunity for building up a strong and prosperous church. Indeed, there is room enough for two churches in this large and fashionable town. The settlement of the Rev. E. Turland at Newbury has already been productive of good results. The chapel, which is one of the oldest Presbyterian structures in England is to be thoroughly renovated, some structural additions to be made and a heating apparatus fixed. These much needed improvements will cost about £250. While friends have contributed generously, the treasurer, Mr. T. Stillman, will be glad of fresh donations. The little church at Deal has been fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. T. Shakespeare, who after six months' engagement has accepted the pastorate. His ministry is proving very acceptable to the people, and it is hoped that better days are in store for the congregation. The pulpit at Reading will be vacant in April. The Rev. E. A. Voysey, B.A., who has placed his resignation in the hands of the congregation, will carry with him their good wishes wherever he may be called to exercise his ministry.

The Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., has taken temporary charge of the Church of Maidstone, which has of late suffered serious losses by the death and removal of liberal supporters; but the friends are looking forward to fresh accessions to their ranks as the result of the present minister's efforts. The settlement of the Rev. G. St. Clair at Eastbourne is a distinct gain to this struggling congregation. The attempt to establish new churches in seaside resorts has not hitherto met with much success in the South Eastern Counties; and it may be questioned whether the expenditure of money and energy would not be more wisely diverted into other more promising districts. Some special Sunday evening services were held at Tunbridge Wells at the beginning of the year. These attracted good congregations, and the friends there were much encouraged. The Mechanics' Institute (the temporary home of the church) was well filled. This little community is still full of vigour, maintaining the cause of liberal religion, and doing its best to broaden men's thoughts, to strengthen their better life, and to enlarge their sympathies on all religious and social questions.

As to the other churches in the province, some are making a little progress, but the majority are simply "marking time." One feature distinctly reveals itself in many of the churches—that of complacent acceptance of the smallness of their numbers, as if this were an essential of a Unitarian Church. They comfort themselves with this thought, and do not consider it worth while to endeavour to bring about a better state of things. The lack of personal effort and hearty co-operation in church work, accounts in no small degree for the unsatisfactory condition of some of our churches. The fires of enthusiasm are burning very low. Oh, for the four winds of heaven to blow upon them and kindle them into a blaze! In some cases churches are a little sleepy. A short time ago a philanthropic association proposed to a country clergyman to organise "a quiet day of recreation for his parishioners." The reply sent back was: "Too many quiet days already. Could you send us an earthquake?" Would not something like an earthquake be an advantage to those churches whose members do not wish to disturb anybody's faith, because they love ease and quiet themselves. What is wanted is a little more missionary zeal.

The minister at Hastings has set a good example, not only for his brethren in the ministry, but for intelligent laymen who have the gift of speech, and who might use that gift in making known to others the grand truths of our glorious Gospel. Some time ago the Rev. Gardner Preston delivered a course of week-evening lectures in the Board school-room, at Clive Vale, a suburb of Hastings. The experiment proved so successful that a second and a third course was arranged, with an average attendance of thirty to forty adults, who were deeply interested in what to them were new truths, or new aspects of old truths, which were brought under their consideration. It is this kind of Mission work which is very much needed, not only for the spread of truth, but for the sake of the spiritual life of the churches themselves. If the power of self-propagation is not possessed, or if being possessed it is not used, by churches in growing neighbourhoods, such churches have ground for humiliation before God and shame before men. If our brethren did but feel the joy of this work, and the value of knowing that we are keeping pace with the growing needs of the world, as set over against the gnawing anxiety, the humiliation, the shame of knowing that we are going back, they would need no words to spur them on. The cause of so many of our churches dwindling may, I think, be traced principally to this lack of expansive and adaptive effort. The Provincial Assembly, I feel sure, will gladly assist any such effort, not only with financial but with ministerial help.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bootle (Appointment).—A unanimous and cordial invitation has been extended to, and accepted by, the Rev. J. Morley Mills, who has just resigned the Nantwich pulpit, to succeed the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, as minister of the Bootle Free Church, commencing Aug. 1 next.

Chatham.—The eleventh anniversary of the opening of the restored church took place on Wednesday last week. After tea there was a public meeting, presided over by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, president of the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly. There was a very good attendance, and the meeting was a most encouraging one. Addresses were given by the chairman, the Rev. S. S. Brettell (Maidstone), the Rev. H. Rawlings (York), and the minister of the church, the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock. The addresses all testified to the importance of individual conviction and devotion, by which alone the highest fruits of fellowship can be attained. Mr. Hitchcock, who was presented by Mr. Whittle, on behalf of the University class, with a copy of Grant's "Ethics of Aristotle" (two vols.), feelingly acknowledged the gift. He said: The gospel of the Unitarians was a proclamation of the realm of the spirit. They looked upon the old creeds and churches with a sympathy that would understand them because they were the works of human reason, and in their time they represented the highest attainment of human reason. They wished to be placed in communion with all thought throughout the world, whether it be the prudential maxims on the lips of Confucius, the craving of Buddha for a life freed from all sensualism, or that which came from the lips of Jesus, and changed the conception of God from the law-giver outside the soul to the voice within us that is capable of judging of the commandment and producing the work of reason. Wherever they looked they saw the work of the spirit and claimed it as the realm of spirit, and this gave them not only freedom but three certainties—the certainty of the human soul; in the nature of that soul we attain to a knowledge of the freedom of man and the immortality of his spirit.

Dover.—Electric light has been installed in the Adrian-street Chapel, and an arc lamp over the gate is a very welcome improvement to the entrance at night.

Gateshead.—On Sunday last the Rev. A. Harvie conducted a Martineau Memorial Service; there was a good congregation. Hymns, prayers, responses, and readings were selected from the works of the great master. The service was most devotional and helpful. Mr. Harvie's discourse will long remain with those who were present an inspiration to emulate the life of one whom all revere.

King's Lynn.—The Rev. George Lansdown has resigned his charge here, and the congregation has received the resignation with unanimous regret. He has accepted an invitation to Billingshurst, and will enter upon his new duties in April.

Leeds: Hunslet.—On Feb. 8 and 10 the annual bazaar was held, and was a greater success than any of its predecessors. It was opened on the 8th by Miss Kitson, of Gledhow Hall, and on the 10th by Mr. J. T. Kitchen, of Apperley Bridge, a member of the sister congregation at Holbeck. The total receipts were nearly £20 higher than last year, being upwards of £111, the highest amount ever reached.

London: Brixton.—At the annual meeting of the congregation, held on Wednesday, Feb. 21, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold in the chair, a warm tribute was paid to Mr. H. Eaton, who, after eighteen years diligent and faithful service, had resigned the office of hon. secretary. Mr. H. T. Terry was appointed to succeed Mr. Eaton. It was pointed out that Mr. Terry represented the fourth generation of the family connection with the Effra-road Church. The annual report bore testimony to the regret of the congregation at the enforced resignation of the Rev. James Harwood, owing to ill-health. Mr. Harwood is now in Egypt, and is benefiting by his stay in that country.

London: Essex Church.—The fourth series of educational lectures is now running its course. The Rev. Edgar I. Fripp has lectured on "Shakespeare and his Times," and Mr. Charles Hecht on "London Markets." On Tuesday last the subject was "Queensland Sketches," and the lecturer was Sir Horace Tozer, Agent-General for Queensland to-day, and formerly Home Secretary of the Queensland Assembly. With the assistance of a hundred slides he illustrated the chief physical features of the colony, its various rural and pastoral pursuits, its ample agricultural resources, its mining and sugar-making industries, and finally its historical and national progress. The Rev. Frank K. Freeston occupied the chair, and a vote of thanks was awarded the lecturer on the motion of Mr. Howard C. Clarke and Mr. Edgar Worthington. There was an audience of 130 persons. On Tuesday next Mr. Lucking Tavener will lecture on "The Works of G. F. Watts," and on the Tuesday following the Rev. Frank K. Freeston will speak of "John Ruskin and his Stones of Venice."

London: Islington.—In aid of the Unity Church Excursion and Christmas Treat Fund, a successful concert was given in the church-room on Thursday last, when a diversified programme, arranged by Mr. J. T. Mackey, was given to a large audience, whose support on this occasion considerably augmented the fund in question. An interesting item consisted of an operetta, entitled The Doll's Wedding, which were very creditably rendered by the children of the school.

London: Stepney Green.—The scholars of the College Chapel School are working hard for the bazaar. On Friday evening they gave a very successful entertainment, "Tableaux and Music," under the direction of Miss Lake and Mr. Cooper. It was very much enjoyed, and brought £1 5s. to the great bazaar fund. On Sunday afternoon last the scholars received their prizes for attendance and conduct, when Miss Lake presented the work boxes and books with well-chosen words. The day being the anniversary of the death of Mr. Spears, a special "In Memoriam" service was conducted by Mr. S. Salt in the evening.

London Sunday School Society.—The annual meeting was held on Saturday, Feb. 24, at Essex Hall, when there was a good attendance. Refreshments were provided from six to seven, when the chair was taken by the retiring president, Mr. F. W. Lawrence, M.A. The treasurer's balance-sheet was presented by Mr. Ion Pritchard, and showed a small balance in hand. Mr. Alec Barnes read the committee's report, which recorded a year of steady progress in the various activities in hand. The two chief features of the past year were the summer meeting of teachers at Oxford and the opening of the Southend Home, generously presented to the Society by Mrs. Bayle Bernard. Other speakers included Miss A. J. Lawrence, treasurer of the Country Holidays Fund, Miss Marian Pritchard, Mr. Harold Wade, the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, the Rev. H. W. Perris, Mr. Leslie Clarke, Mr. Mackay, and Mr. T. W. Turner. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie was elected president for the year 1900. Mr. Ion Pritchard, treasurer, Messrs. Alec Barnes and Harold Wade, secretaries, and the following to form committee:—Miss Pritchard, Miss Tayler, Miss A. J. Lawrence, Messrs. J. S. Cooper, F. Talbot, and J. Ballantyne. At the close of the business meeting, Mr. F. W. Lawrence gave a most interesting and suggestive address on some problems of the twentieth century. He referred especially to those evils which had grown up in the closing century, such as the alarming increase of armaments, the overcrowding and consequent degradation in our great cities, the unemployed difficulty, and the underpayment of women workers. These, he said, were some of the problems for the twentieth century. To solve them there were needed men and women sound in body and mind, and carefully trained in intellectual judgment. But this was not all: moral sense was absolutely essential; and he concluded by pointing out to his hearers that it rested largely with them to implant such seeds of morality and integrity in young minds, that those who came after them might be true men and women, who would make the twentieth century long remembered as the great era of progress in human fellowship.

Nantwich.—On Sunday week, the anniversary of the death in 1546 of Martin Luther, the Rev. J. Morley Mills took the life of the great reformer as the subject for his evening sermon, drawing from it a lesson of trust in the ever-present Spirit of God, as constantly prompting men to higher, nobler, holier thought, work, and life.

Swansea.—In the report of the church which appeared a fortnight ago, a paragraph should have read that Mr. Jones submitted his paper to Fellows and other Graduates, and not to the Geographical Society as a body, and was elected in the ordinary way. Before the Philosophy class in the month of February, three interesting lectures were delivered. Rev. T. Sinclair Evans, Congregational minister, lectured on "Welsh Folk-lore," Mr. Tabb on "The West Indies," and Dr. Reid gave a "Demonstration on the Brain." Work is proceeding in connection with the bazaar, which will be held on April 18 and 19. The minister is writing "The History of the Church," which will be published in April.

The North-East Lancashire Sunday-school Union.—On Saturday last the Union held its first conference of the year at Accrington. After tea a capital paper on "Teaching the Teacher" was read by Mr. A. W. Wallington, of Colne, who is a member of the Baptist denomination. The difficulties of the average teacher were mentioned, and the essayist then urged the need of a preparation class for teachers presided over by a layman. Mr. Nicholas Ingham, who occupied the chair, invited discussion, which was engaged in by the Revs. Arthur W. Fox, J. H. Wicksteed, W. H. Burgess; Messrs. P. Bibby, J. S. Mackie, Haworth, Holden, and Graham. Songs were rendered by Mrs. Webster and Mrs. Hargreaves.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The thirty-second Teachers' Conference took place on Saturday, Feb. 10, in the Northgate End Sunday-school, Halifax. There was a good gathering, weather considered, Halifax being well represented. After tea a meeting was held, the President (Mr. Fred. Clayton) in the chair. There were also present the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., J. G. Slater, and James Taylor; Messrs. Teal, Slater, Brook, Stott, Briggs, Wilson, E. Jackson, P. Jackson, Wadsworth, C. H. Boyle (secretary), and a number of ladies. The Rev. W. Mellor (Huddersfield) read a paper on "The Church and the Sunday-school in their Relation to each other; an old Problem in new Conditions." The paper was extremely suggestive, and contained many valuable points of interest, particularly to the Sunday-school of the future. In the course of the discussion which followed, the wish found varied expression that some means might be found of inducing the elder scholars in all our schools to take a greater interest in the Church by seeking in larger numbers to become members, and identifying themselves more closely with many of the organisations connected therewith. Among the speakers were Miss Shackleton, the Revs. E. Ceredig Jones, J. G. Slater, James Taylor, the President, and Messrs. Stott, Brook, and Teal. Mr. Mellor having been thanked for his paper, a similar compliment was paid to the Halifax friends for their hospitality, and also for the choice selections of vocal and instrumental music with which the proceedings were interspersed during the evening.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE full programme of arrangements for the Seventh Triennial Conference to be held at Leicester on April 3, 4, 5, and 6 will be found advertised in another column. The Conference sermon is to be preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., on the evening of the first day, and on the following morning, after the opening devotional service, an address is to be given by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., LL.D., on "James Martineau: His Life and Influence." Next comes the first paper of the Conference, by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., on "The Historical Development of our Freedom and Faith and the Importance of its Study." Other subjects to be discussed during the Conference are "How Best to Organise the Religious Life of our Young People," "The Future Supply of our Ministers," and "The Conduct of Public Worship." On the Thursday morning two papers are to be read, without discussion, by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, on "The Fear of God and the Sense of Sin," and by Mrs. Humphry Ward, on "Gospel Interpretation—a specimen chapter." The business meeting follows on Thursday afternoon, at which the report as to Ministerial Pensions will be presented, and resolutions are to be moved by Mr. J. Cogan Conway and Mr. David Ainsworth. At the public meeting on Thursday evening, under the presidency of Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., the subject "Signs of Progress in Christendom" will be treated by the Revs. J. Page Hopps, L. de B. Klein, D.Sc., Joseph Wood, and Mr. F. Maddison, M.P. It is altogether a strong programme, which should attract a very large gathering of friends, and ensure to this meeting of the Conference a success as delightful and productive of good to our churches as any of former years.

AT the annual meeting of the Aborigines Protection Society held on Thursday week, under the presidency of Mr. Alfred E. Pease, M.P., it was announced that as the result of a special appeal the Society had been able to send £50 weekly to Zulus on whom the war had brought great hardships. The Bishop of London moved :—

That this meeting welcomes the Marquis of Salisbury's statement in the House of Lords on Oct. 17 last, that as one of the issues of the present war in South Africa, "due precaution will be taken for the philanthropic and kindly and improving treatment of the indigenous races, of whose destiny we have been too forgetful," and appeals to Her Majesty's Government to do all in its power towards the performance of that promise; and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

The settlement after the war, he said, ought to make perfectly clear the fact that we were striving not for our own selfish interests, but to enlarge the scope of a heightening and broadening civilising power. By that we must assuredly stand or fall, for the future would belong to that people whose influence was most beneficent. Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P., said that no one could pretend that the Dutch of South Africa had been stainless in their relations to the blacks; the record was fouled with blood, and was full of cruelty, wrong, robbery, and something approaching to slavery. And yet they had to ask themselves, "For anything that has happened there, cannot we find a parallel among our own people?" The Society must take care that in any future settlement of lands in South Africa there were not introduced veiled forms of slavery such as had existed in some lands, in some degree, under our control. They must be on their guard against plans which isolated natives and kept them entirely under the power of a few trading, mining, or speculative men.

IT was a good omen for increased attention to the pressing problem of the Housing of the Poor that the Prince and Princess of Wales went to Shoreditch on Saturday to open the Boundary-street Estate, where the County Council have erected large blocks of model dwellings around a central garden, on the site of what was formerly a disgraceful wilderness of slums, one of the worst plague spots of the metropolis. The Daily News, in an interesting article on the subject, recalled the interest shown by the late Prince Consort in the subject, and the work done by the Prince of Wales on the Royal Commission, which reported in 1885. The Prince on Saturday made a practical and able speech, quoting the report of Dr. Southwood Smith in 1839, and showing what had been done by the County Council, and by such private enterprise as that of Lord Rowton and Lord Iveagh. "I am satisfied," he said, "not only that the public conscience is awakened on the subject, but that the public demands, and will continue to demand, vigorous action in cleansing the slums which disgrace our civilisation, in the erection of good and wholesome dwellings such as those around us, and in meeting the difficulties of providing house-room for the working-classes at reasonable rates by easy and cheap carriage to not distant districts where rents are reasonable." The Daily News points out that the Bill now before Parliament is only a very meagre instalment of what is required to meet a most urgent need.

THE March number of Macmillan's Magazine contains a short anonymous article on Dr. Martineau, "Some Recollections by a Friend." The writer dwells upon his great and unaffected modesty, which is not always found linked with such genius, and notes the fund of dry humour he possessed and his great charm in conversation. The "Seat of Authority" is referred to as Dr. Martineau's last great book, and from it the following passage is quoted, as singularly appropriate to the gracious spirit of the author :—

Among the societies of men, it is ever the greater spirits that morally sustain the less; and, as the scale of realised excellence ascends, the conscience of us all is ashamed to linger, and eventually rises too. We are lifted by the souls of mightier wing, and are set where otherwise our feet would not have climbed.

The article then concludes :—

We cannot dispose of Dr. Martineau's religious teaching by labelling it Unitarian. Great souls belong to no denomination.

They shame all petty sectarians to whom differences of opinion appear as signs of moral disaffection, and testify to the existence of those spiritual bonds of kinship which link together all earnest and truth-loving souls.

[illegible] several of Dr. Martineau's letters, which he had from time to time received, and among them a letter written in 1893, in reply to a difficulty he had expressed, as to what he here calls the "curious mixture of scepticism and mysticism, of Conservatism and Radicalism, of inexorable logic and illogical pietism," which he had noted in Dr. Martineau's attitude as a philosophical and theological teacher. The following is part of Dr. Martineau's reply:—

"You are quite entitled, in strictness of logical criticism, to lay any stress it may seem to deserve on my inconsistent moods of mind towards the contents of the Fourth Gospel. It is very true that, among elements in the narrative alike unaccredited by adequate external testimony, I do retain some and reject others on grounds of internal concordance or discordance with the essence of the personality of Jesus, as already gathered from the really historical materials furnished by the other gospels. My faith even in these earlier records rests much more on the unique portraiture they present of a human life perfected in its relations with the Divine Father, than in the security of their witness borne to particular facts and words. Traditions floating about in shreds of oral report for thirty or forty years, before being precipitated into the littera scripta now in our hands, cannot but lose in the process much that they had and pick up yet more that they had not; and no subsequent care in sifting them—such as Luke, for example, claims to have bestowed on them—can sever for us the pure history from its accretions. But tradition works up only the material of the commonplace imagination; it cannot invent, it can only impair and spoil, the personality of a Christ; crediting it with ever more startling marvels of physical power, while lowering its ideal grandeur and spiritual perfection. In reading the synoptic reports of the life and work of Jesus, I cannot help recognising in certain passages of action or discourse the stamp of a Divine originality, of an insight which, in its utterance, constitutes Revelation; that here I am in contact with him I can never doubt; while in sharpest contrast with these are a few incidents and not a few utterances which no host of witnesses could induce me to ascribe to the author of the others. The internal evidence thus inevitably controls the external. It is then but a slight step further, if it is allowed to dispense with the external; and to carry its own weight when, in a later and less attested Gospel, sayings flow from the lips of Jesus which are wholly in character with those which have already brought us to his feet. If he did not utter them, these are, at all events, the outcome of his spirit in its regenerating work upon the mind and imagination of the Church. On these grounds I think it quite permissible to let the Fourth Evangelist prolong for us into the second century the appeal of Jesus to his disciples, so far as it preserves its own tone; the more so, as it is always possible that the writer may have fallen in with a vein of traditions not hitherto wrought into the "Evangelical narrative."

The March number of The New Kingdom, which is a special "Martineau number," opens with a study of the great teacher by the Rev. William Mellor, who speaks of him as "a theologian and philosopher, a leader of men and Church idealist," and Mr. Mellor adds, "as true a poet as ever lived." A good part of the paper is taken up with an interesting account of some of the most striking of Dr. Martineau's essays, which were preliminary studies for his greater philosophical works. Having spoken in conclusion of Dr. Martineau's ideal of church fellowship, Mr. Mellor says: "With his direct vision of God, with his power of realising the Unseen and the Eternal, we may, in God's own time and in the normal order of human events, realise also his ideal of a truly Free Church of the Living God; and that, certainly, is the only aim worthy of our history, worthy of our essential principles, and worthy of the mission which God and our best men and women have laid upon us."

This month's Seed Sower contains two articles on Ruskin, the first being on "Ruskin, the Interpreter of Nature," an address by the Rev. Joseph Wood at a Ruskin Memorial service, the second by the Rev. H. Gow on "Ruskin as Social Reformer." There is also an illustrated article on Deptford, in the series on "Our Ancient Chapels," by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, the greater part of which, however, is extracted from an interesting letter of reminiscences by Miss Squier, the daughter and granddaughter of two former ministers. The Rev. E. P. Barrow continues his article on "Types of Service—III. Handicraftsman." A timely article by Mrs. Mills, "Let in the Light," concludes the number.

Lovers of Ruskin should secure the March Bookman, which is a Memorial number, with as many as thirty-six illustrations, large and small, connected with Ruskin, fifteen of them being portraits at different ages. On one page the portrait is surrounded by charming glimpses of Brantwood and Coniston, there is a picture of the Oxford road-making by Ruskin's students, and also a reproduction of one of his own early drawings (at the age of sixteen) at Friburg. Mr. J. A. Hobson contributes an article on "Ruskin as Social Reformer," and the number also contains an interesting collection of Ruskiniana.

Through the February and March numbers of Harper we have followed Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel, "Eleanor," with deepening interest. Lucy Foster is altogether delightful, and Mr. Sterner, who illustrates the story, is far more successful with her than with Manisty. In the March number there is a very striking description of a great scene in St. Peter's, when the Pope is carried in and chants the Apostolic Benediction. Lucy Foster, the Puritan girl from a New England village, is greatly impressed.

Yet, as she looks, within the visible scene there opens another: the porch of a plain shingled house, her uncle sitting within it, his pipe and his newspaper on his knee, sunning himself in the April morning. She passes behind him, looks into the stiff leaf-scented parlour—at the framed Declaration of Independence on the walls, the fresh boughs in the fireplace, the Bible on its table, the rag carpet before the hearth. She breathes the atmosphere of the house; its stern independence and simplicities; the scorns and the denials, the sturdy freedoms both of body and soul that it implies—conscience the only master—vice-master for God in this His house of the world. And beyond—as her lids sink for an instant on the pageant before her—she hears, as it were, the voices of her country, so young, and raw, and strong; she feels within her the throb of its struggling, self-assertive life; she is conscious, too, of the uglinesses and meannesses that belong to birth and newness, to growth and fermentation. Then, in a proud timidity—as one who feels herself an alien and on sufferance—she hangs again upon the incomparable scene.

Twice last week Mr. J. H. Leigh, M.A., gave his reading of Hamlet, on Wednesday, in aid of the funds of the Manchester Domestic Mission (as will be seen from a report in another column), and on Saturday afternoon at Steinway Hall, in aid of the funds of the London Unitarian Bazaar. Steinway Hall was not overcrowded, but there was a good audience, and Mr. Leigh's reading, with Dr. Ernest Walker's special music, was warmly appreciated. The essential scenes of the play are skilfully selected by Mr. Leigh and grouped into three acts, and in the reading, which was for the most part a dramatic recitation of great power, one realised how much can be given of Shakespeare's marvellous creation without any [illegible] been distinguished by capacity and enthusiasm of the highest order.

The fifty-fifth annual meeting of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association is to be held on Good Friday at Bolton. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., is announced as the preacher, and a paper is to be read by Miss Edith Gittins, of Leicester, on "Use, without Abuse, of a Holiday Home Paradise."

Let not anyone use that severity in the case of another, which his own case will not bear; for a man may condemn himself in the person of another. — Benjamin Whichcote.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

The Progress of Science and its Significance for Religion.

II.

Science and Theology cannot be kept apart, though the effort to assign to them separate spheres has sometimes been made, in the interests of peace. When geologists learned from rocks and fossils the vast age of the earth as a theatre of life, they were rebuked for contradicting the Bible account of Creation. The amiable poet Cowper spoke for many thousands besides himself when he said—

> . . . Some drill and bore
> The solid earth, and from the strata there
> Extract a register, by which we learn
> That He who made it, and revealed its date
> To Moses, was mistaken in its age.

A narrow interpretation of Scripture, and a belief in its infallibility, naturally led to obstructiveness. It was contended that the Bible being the Word of God, and Nature His work, they are bound to be in harmony; and the inference of orthodox believers was that the scientific conclusion was false. But the man of science, on his side, felt that he could be sure of his facts, more than he could be sure of the teaching of the Church, or the knowledge possessed by Hebrew writers. Students of Nature were not necessarily godless, and sometimes they or their sympathisers laboured to build up a Natural Theology, arguing at least for a Divine government of the world. Ray's "Wisdom of God," and Paley's "Natural Theology" are only examples of a class of books, while the Bridgewater Treatises made it their special aim to exhibit the beneficent adaptations with which the world abounds. Nevertheless a multitude of people for a long time remained persuaded that Natural Religion and Revealed were rather in contrast than in harmony, and that to pursue the former was no better than a heathen kind of groping in the dark. Reason, however, was on the side of the scientific man, and as discovery followed discovery the defenders of the Bible cosmogony had to give way. At the beginning of the century a literal six-days' creation was believed in by all but a few; at the end of the century it is believed in by only a few.

In the great Mohammedan University in the city of Cairo, the Koran is used as a text-book not only for theology but for cosmogony and other science. It teaches that all things were created in six days; that there are seven heavens; that the waters of Noah's flood boiled over out of an oven; the earth is kept steady by the mountains, and an earthquake is a sign of the approach of the last day. What is not contained in the Koran is deemed either untrue or superfluous; and on this account Mohammedan countries are backward in scientific knowledge and useful invention. Some Arabs being asked by Mungo Park what became of the sun at night, and whether it was always the same sun, or new each day, replied that such a question was childish and entirely beyond the reach of human investigation. We in Western Europe are now emancipated from any such thraldom to a book, and a large part of the freedom has been won for us during the century now closing.

The science of astronomy has made Immense strides; and the result has been to put fuller meaning into the words that "the heavens declare the glory of God." In the year 1781 William Herschel had discovered the planet which is now called Uranus, far beyond "utmost Saturn," which had hitherto been regarded as on the confines of the solar system. In 1847 the limits were again immensely extended by the addition of the planet Neptune, whose existence and mass and place and period were discovered by calculation, and then duly confirmed by telescopic observation. One result of these discoveries was to break down more effectually the old-world superstition of a mysterious connection between the planets and the days of the week. Although we have Saturn's-day, Sun-day, Moon-day, &c., the association is artificial, and cannot lend support to the notion that the ancients learned astronomy by revelation. We may claim also that although mediæval astrology is still fostered by books and almanacs which have a large sale, there is not much alarm felt now at the occurrence of an eclipse or the appearance of a comet. The cause of eclipses is now popularly understood, and comets have been shown to obey the law of gravitation, while any lingering dread of a collision has been dissipated since the earth's passage through a comet's tail in the year 1861. The discovery that the sun and stars contain the same chemical elements as those which compose the substance of the earth, lends plausibility to the theory which assigns to them a common origin and seeks to account for the birth and growth of worlds and systems. The Nebular Hypothesis propounded by Laplace was fiercely resisted on account of its supposed atheism; and there was considerable rejoicing when it appeared to be discredited. Lord Rosse's enormous telescope, being brought to bear on the Milky Way and various nebulæ, showed in one instance after another that what had been assumed to be fire mist was really a close aggregation of stars. Nevertheless some of the nebulosities were never thus resolved, and when the astronomer was furnished with a new instrument in the spectroscope, he found actual evidence of glowing gas. The Nebular Hypothesis is now in part revived; but the difference is that the Churches are not again alarmed; there is a greater readiness to yield up the physical universe to the domain of Law.

The first half of the century witnessed a notable controversy on the question of the Plurality of Worlds, that is, of habitable planets similar to our own, and actually dwelt in by creatures similar to ourselves. Earlier centuries had seen the "Conversation" of Fontenelle on the subject, as well as Bishop Wilkins' arguments for the habitability of the moon, and the more scientific work of Christianus Huygens. These authors offered bold "conjectures concerning the inhabitants, plants and productions of the worlds in the planets." But after the discovery of the planet Neptune an anonymous author, believed to be Professor Whewell, published an essay in which he brought a great array of evidence to prove that hardly any globe besides our own possessed the necessary physical conditions. This contention greatly displeased Sir David Brewster, to whom "More Worlds than One" was "the Creed of the Philosopher and the hope of the Christian." These were the chief protagonists, though others joined in the fray. It is curious that orthodox Christians should cherish the belief in other inhabited worlds; because it lays them open to the question of Tom Paine, whether the Son of God has visited these worlds in succession, to die for the salvation of the inhabitants? It is unreasonable to suppose that intelligent creatures, like ourselves in other respects, should not have had the like experience of temptation and sin; and there seems no answer to the question, except on Unitarian views, of God's forgiveness of the penitent without atoning sacrifice. The question, however, is not much discussed; the thoughts of men being more interested in their own world, and the race to which they belong.

We have remarked that Dr. Pye Smith fell under suspicion, and the author of the "Vestiges" did not openly avow himself. Darwin was howled at, and his theory was ridiculed; but he quietly worked on, and eventually was buried with honour in Westminster Abbey, dignitaries of Church and State being proud to bear his pall. In the warfare which has now been carried on ever since the days of Copernicus, the men of science are always at last victorious. Huxley has said that about the cradle of every science the extinguished theologians lie strangled, like snakes about the cradle of Hercules.

The great upheaval and overturn of ancient dogmas and beliefs has laid upon reverent thinkers the duty of reconstruction. With a wider and truer knowledge of Nature, they have a broader basis on which to rear the edifice of theological and religious truth. "To restore animation and hope in the presence of the religious prospect thus profoundly transformed," was regarded by Matthew Arnold as the work of the best friends of mankind. It may fairly be said that no body of men have set themselves more intelligently to this task than Unitarian preachers and writers. The existence of God, the obligations of duty, the grounds of hope in a future life, have been successfully maintained against all the materialistic tendencies of the age. The argument to God as Power from our intuitive sense of cause, and the argument to God as Righteousness from our moral sense or conscience—so conspicuously held by James Martineau—are in no way weakened by the Nebular hypothesis or the Evolution doctrine. These, as the author of the "Vestiges" maintained, show the methods of the Divine operation: God may not be like a Potter moulding the clay, but He is working in us and informing all things; all things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that hath been made. With regard to the creation of man, although not formed directly from the dust, but owing his existence to predecessors, the natural birth is not a sufficient explanation without the Divine purpose and potency. When man does appear, he is "so noble in reason, so infinite in faculties, in form and moving so express and admirable, in action so like an angel, in apprehension so like a god," that his ultimate parentage must certainly be divine. It matters little through what lowly forms his being can be traced, he is of more value than many sparrows now. Besides, whatever difficulty can be imagined, existed before, and Evolution is not responsible for it; for it has always been known that every individual birth comes through lowly forms. Moreover, unless the individual child now is without a Creator, because born of parents, the acknowledgment of a parentage for the human race does not exclude God. As far as observation extends, the chicken has always come from an egg; and it cannot fairly be said that Evolution has introduced any new difficulty. These views are spreading, and so it is becoming recognised that the principle of Evolution, which deserves to rank with the law of gravitation, is not a foe to religion.

It has been assumed by some writers that Evolution completely undermines the Design argument; but it is only on a superficial view that it seems to do so. It may be admitted that it has made the Bridgewater Treatises appear antiquated, and shown that Paley's illustration of the watch is scarcely adequate. Instead of the white fur of arctic animals having been given to them at their creation, in designed adaptation to the snow around them, we are now taught that all individuals showing colour would be seen by foes and become exterminated. The same with desert animals of sandy hue, and insects resembling leaves and twigs, or coloured like the bark of trees; all protective resemblances seem to be brought about by a kind of automatic machinery.

No doubt there is such a force or influence at work; and yet we must remain persuaded that eyes are made to see with, and "He that made the eye, shall not He see?" and does He not work by natural means to will and to do His good pleasure? The Design Argument has been safe, in the hands of Dr. W. B. Carpenter, Dr. Martineau, and, indeed, of all eminent writers who maintain that Evolution is not without God. Whether purpose is being worked out is to be judged by processes and results; and we not only see enough to prove it, as when a bird's wing is recognised as an exquisite piece of mechanism, but Evolution shows that the plan is infinitely larger than we thought, and suggests that the consummation will be infinitely grander. The succession of lower forms of life was a long prologue to the human drama; and, although few people now look for a speedy millennium, faith is deepened in "one far-off divine event, to which the whole creation moves."

The doubts engendered by the science of the century, particularly as suggesting Nature's carelessness of the individual life, are wrestled with in Tennyson's "In Memoriam," and "The Two Voices"; and the result is to confirm faith. God and Nature are not at strife; and "nothing walks with aimless feet," while all things are tending towards some happy goal. Meantime the preacher who seeks to justify the ways of God to man, finds in Darwinian doctrines the likeliest solution of the problem of war and man's warlike propensities. The law of the "survival of the fittest," however, it can be shown, has ceased to favour the physically strong, and gives preference now to superior intellect. It is even beginning to exalt morals above mind, and prophesies that some day the meek shall inherit the earth.

But while it is comparatively easy for the Theist, and the Christian untrammelled by fixed creeds, to bring science and faith into harmony, especially where little besides the date and method of creation is concerned, the adjustment is less easy for those who cling to traditional beliefs and the letter of Scripture. The proved antiquity of man has led some writers to argue for pre-Adamic races, whose career was closed before Scripture begins. The long lives of the patriarchs—extending to many hundreds of years—is leading others to think that the names designate tribes and not individuals. The comparison with Babylonian records is bringing many to regard all the earlier chapters of Genesis as legendary. We might have expected that the evolution of mankind from a lower race, and the evidence that they for a long time sheltered in caverns, and lived by hunting and fishing, would have led to the abandonment of the doctrine of the Fall. In some quarters it is, indeed, given up, and it is hardly heresy to disavow it at a Church Congress or in a Presbyterian pulpit; but many are holding on to it, with a modified explanation. Adam, though ignorant as a savage, was at first innocent they say, and experienced a moral fall. The reluctance to part with the Fall is no doubt owing, in some measure, to its bearing on the general scheme of doctrine. If there was no Fall, what is to be said of Original Sin, or inherited depravity, of Christ's sacrifice for sin, of the Levitical sacrifices as types of Christ, &c.? To the Unitarian these difficulties do not occur; for it is quite consonant with his general thought that mankind should have had a childhood, and received an education (not probation), and be going on towards full strength and manhood. The new science of Anthropology has shown him the universality and motive of sacrifice. The Evolution doctrine has taught him that cunning, cruelty, lust, and all the "motions of sins in the members," are as "taints of blood" derived from far-off humble progenitors, in whom they could not be blamed. They are wrong in man because the Creator has put His spirit into him, and is teaching him to leave the things that are behind and "follow the gleam." Thus the incompatibility of new science with old theology comes as a relief to the rational servant of God, and is a strong support to the general truth of his views. In other Churches, however, many preachers and writers still follow Paul in contrasting the First Adam with the Second; and even if they have relinquished the Fall are slow to perceive the logical consequences. It is hard to understand; for if Adam and Eve did not take forbidden fruit, they cannot by their disobedience have "brought death into the world, and all our woe," and entailed upon all their posterity a sinful nature and a curse. But we must allow time for logic to do its perfect work.

There is one difficulty which has been felt, not only by orthodox believers, but by all who have considered the subject. If man derived his existence from a lower creature, when did he become possessed of a moral nature—at what stage did he begin to be responsible for his conduct—and when was he endowed with immortality? The answer must again be that the Evolution theory is not responsible for this difficulty, because in another shape it was felt before, and often discussed. At what age does a child become responsible? At what stage do "hidden, untimely births" possess immortal souls? Sharp lines and defined boundaries are absent from a good many things in Nature (who can say where small becomes large or twilight passes into darkness?) and we may have to leave the question unsolved. But we should remember that it was asked before; and also that John Wesley, and many besides, have conceived that the lower animals, as well as man, will live again.

On the whole subject, it may be safely said that the scientific discoveries of the century call for a reconstruction of theological doctrine from beginning to end. The Fall could not disappear without changing the teaching about Redemption. The Origins and Beginnings could not assume a new aspect without corresponding alteration in Eschatology—the Doctrine of the Last Things.

II.—The Gifford Lectures.

(Concluded.)

We will first revert to the important matter which we pointed out in the former paper, that in these Lectures two very different philosophical conceptions of the relation between God's will and man's will appear to be juxta-posed without any express recognition of their difference or any attempt to reconcile them. When Dr. Caird wrote that the human will or self which possesses a power of self-determination is not an "unmotived will," it is very much to be regretted that he did not go on to explain what he really meant by the expression "not unmotived"; for if he had so done we should have clearly known whether he sided with philosophers like Dr. Martineau and Lotze or with philosophers of the Hegelian school. Of course, thinkers of both schools admit that there can be no such thing as self-determination in the absence of motives. Both schools assert that a man in his moral decisions expresses, and must express, his character. Whether, in a moment of temptation, a man's self-determination sides with his sensual and selfish desires or with his ideal of righteousness and love, in both cases alike he expresses some feature of his character; and the question between the two schools of thought is whether the human self or soul is so constituted by God that it can make a free alternative choice as to which of the conflicting elements in its own character it will throw its personal energy upon, and so make that feature the one which is realised in the actual conduct. If a man's self or ego has this power of free preferential choice between the conflicting motives which spring simultaneously out of its character, then it is evident that the man who freely takes sides with the lower in the presence of the higher motive, does in this very act of free self-determination estrange himself for a time from the revealed will of the Father within him; and that, therefore, man in virtue of this power of free choice between alternative possibilities, which is delegated to him by God, may within certain limits resist and retard the Divine Will as expressed in his reason and in his moral ideal. Now, the point to be noted is that Dr. Caird in these Lectures very frequently uses language which asserts or implies that the relation between God's Will and man's will is of such a nature as to allow of the possibility of this real discord, and that indeed all that is most precious in the personal relations between God and the human soul would be non-existent if human nature were so constituted that the will of man could not freely oppose itself to the felt Will of God. But the philosophy of the will here presented is precisely that held by such thinkers as Dr. Martineau; and it is precisely not the philosophy of the will which Dr. Caird mentions and accepts at the beginning of his eleventh lecture, where he expressly rejects what he calls "indeterminism" or the "freedom of indifference." Here, accordingly, he adopts the philosophy of his brother and of T. H. Green; and, as we have seen, these eminent men take such a view of the relation of a man's self to his character as renders it inconceivable that a man's self-determination in seasons of temptation should possibly be different from that which it actually is; and hence, as in this theory of the will no man's character can evolve in any other way than that in which it actually does evolve, it becomes absurd to talk of any real opposition or estrangement between the human will and the Divine Will; and so the Christian doctrine of Sin loses all rational justification. The writer of an Hegelian "Manual of Ethics" once admitted to us that this doctrine of his comes practically to much the same thing as the old Calvinism minus hell; and he added, "Don't you think it is a very agreeable doctrine?" To which we replied that it would be, no doubt, very comfortable to think that nobody is really to be blamed for his self-determinations, and that in the long run the eternal thought-principle will do the only possible thing, and therefore the best thing, for everybody; but that we did not think that this was an inspiring doctrine, or that it could well be harmonised with our actual moral consciousness. But what we wish to impress upon the readers of Dr. Caird's "Gifford Lectures" is that, whether this view is true or not, it certainly is not the doctrine which the ordinary reader would assume to be held by the writer of these Lectures; and we, further, confidently assert that what gives their impressiveness and beauty to the chief ethical utterances in these volumes, and renders these utterances in appearance consonant with Christian thought and sentiment, is the tacitly assumed reality of that very "indeterminism," which, in words, Dr. Caird distinctly repudiates. We make no apology for dwelling at such length on this topic, for, as the late Dr. Martineau clearly saw, we encounter here a fundamental and most important opposition between two forms of the philosophy of ethics and religion; and we cannot but regard the conscious or unconscious tendency in Dr. John Caird's mind to so express himself as to confuse and conceal the real issue between these fundamentally different modes of conception as, to say the least of it, an unfortunate circumstance which cannot be advantageous to either philosophy or religion. Those readers, however, who agree with Dr. Martineau's ethical theory will find strong confirmation for their view of the freedom of the will in the fact that Dr. John Caird in many of the finest ethical passages of these Lectures appears, at all events, to be building, not on Hegel's and Green's, but on Dr. Martineau's philosophical foundation.

These remarks will serve to pave the way to an account of one of the most interesting topics discussed in this work—namely, the Incarnation of God in humanity and also His special Incarnation in Jesus of Nazareth. Of the many true and beautiful passages in these Lectures we have met with none which we admire more than we do the following:—

> It is of the very essence of the religious life to be a life that is at once above us and in us, transcending our finite thoughts and feelings, yet in which we most truly realise ourselves and the ideal of our own spiritual nature. For, is it not so that in every moral and religious impulse and action, in all our spiritual experiences, we are aware of a power, a presence, an authority, which, though in us, is yet above us; which we have not made nor can unmake, which asserts an absolute domination over our souls, and of which from one point of view we are only the passive organs? What this absolute principle, this imperative of truth and goodness, demands of every human spirit, is the sacrifice, the surrender, the abnegation of our private and particular self—its shallow opinions, its limited ends and interests; that we cease to think our own thoughts, to gratify our own desires, to do our own will, but rejoice to let this absolute, all-comprehending will reign in us and over us.
> This felt immanence of God in our self-consciousness—in our reason and in our ethical and æsthetic ideals—is a truth unspeakably precious to the religious mind; and it is a truth which, as we think, Unitarian preachers and writers until comparatively recent times have not adequately apprehended and realised. When we carefully reflect on this incarnation of God in man's inner life, it becomes evident that the connection of God with the spirit of man is an inconceivably more intimate relationship than the relationship between finite personalities can possibly be; and it therefore becomes the imperature and difficult task of the ethical and religious philosopher to at once do justice in his theory to this sense of God's immediate presence and activity in the soul's higher life, and at the same time to maintain the existence of such a degree of delegated independence and causal activity in the individual soul as shall save us from plunging either into unintelligible mysticism or into non-ethical Pantheism. Now if we assume that Dr. J. Caird really means what he appears to mean when he tells us that our moral decisions are attended with "the possibility of an opposite alternative," it must be allowed that these Lectures contribute most valuable aid towards the attainment of a satisfying conception of the immanence, or incarnation, of God in the human soul. It is only now and then, as when, for instance, he speaks of the possible identification of the will of man with the will of God, that Dr. Caird seems to lapse into a kind of phraseology which it is difficult to distinguish from Pantheism. But probably even here his language was not intended to be taken quite literally, for he sometimes speaks of the will of a saintly man as approaching identification with the will of God and, at other times, as approaching harmony with the Eternal Will; and harmony is, of course, a totally different thing from identity. But probably here too, as in the case of the Freedom of the Will, his mind was oscillating between the prevalent conceptions of Christian Theists and the requirements of the Hegelian philosophy.

In his treatment of the assumed exceptional Incarnation of God in Jesus, Dr. Caird's judgment appears to us to have been much warped by the influence of Presbyterian orthodoxy as well as by an untenable view of the authority of the New Testament writings. There is much, accordingly, in his lectures on this subject which seems to us to be forced and uninspiring, and to be wholly devoid of philosophical consistency. He contrasts his own view of the Incarnation of God in Jesus with what he calls "the Deistic or Unitarian view." Let us inquire, then, what really is the difference between his view of the personality of Jesus and that of those Christian Theists who recognise in the character of Jesus the highest possible realisation in human nature of moral and spiritual perfection. It appears that Dr. Caird regarded Jesus, not simply as a person who actually resisted all temptations to sin, but as a person who by his very nature was intrinsically incapable of sin; for he refers to him as a "Being absolutely and immutably good." He does not explain to us how such a being can intelligibly be said to be "tempted," nor does he appear to pay any attention to the saying attributed to Jesus: "Call not me good; there is none good but God." He informs us also, apparently on no other ground than that of one or two statements attributed to Paul and John, that the union of the human with the divine in the person and life of Christ "includes an element which differentiates it from the spiritual life and experience of all other men," because Jesus is said to have spoken of "the glory which he had with the Father before the world was." This treatment of Jesus as a quite abnormal person inevitably lands the author of these "Gifford Lectures" in numerous inconsistencies. In one passage, for instance, he tells us that we are right in regarding Christ's life as the perfect "ideal of human excellence," and when we ask what are the chief characteristics of this ideal of human excellence we are assured that "the best, purest, noblest human souls are just those who are least satisfied with themselves and with their own spiritual attainments." Are we, then, to conclude, as Dr. Caird's Christology appears to compel us to do, that this "immutably and absolutely good Being," who was essentially incapable of sinning, was at the same time profoundly dissatisfied with himself and with his own spiritual attainments? That the actual Jesus of Nazareth was so dissatisfied, we can well believe, but this dissatisfaction only becomes intelligible and divinely beautiful when the relationship of the will and personality of Jesus to the Father within him is regarded as essentially of the same kind as that which obtains in the case of other rational beings who are made in the image of God, and when, accordingly, the absolute sinlessness of Jesus (if it be a fact) is explained not as arising from an exceptional inability to sin, but from the perfect and unvaried fidelity of his will the promptings of the immanent Eternal Will. It is very curious and interesting to note how in these Lectures the ecclesiastical or doctrinal animus which induces Dr. Caird, in certain passages, to place Jesus in some measure outside of the category of humanity, alternates in his mind with the high and noble philosophic impulse to represent the life and character of Jesus as simply the culmination and the realisation of those ethical and spiritual possibilities which are inherent in every rational being in virtue of the incarnation and progressive self-revelation in human nature of the eternal life and character of God.

In connection with Dr. Caird's view of the exceptional Incarnation of God in Jesus we must not omit to mention that he contends with the utmost emphasis and earnestness for the view that Suffering and Self-sacrifice are essential elements in the nature of God. In the self-revelation of God made to us through His incarnation in Christ we reach a conception of Him which is not "that of an impersonal being which cannot be affected by pain or sorrow, but that of a being who can bear, with us and for us, the burden of our guilt, and who, in one sense, can endure for us a reflected shame and sorrow, infinitely more intense and poignant than our own." To enter upon a discussion of this profound subject would carry us far beyond the limits of this paper, but we may allow ourselves to say that the greatest burden of the sinner's guilt is the poignancy of self-reproach and remorse, and we find it impossible to conceive how the burden of this species of suffering can be in any true sense experienced and borne by the Eternal.

There is one more very important question discussed in this work, that of the Future Life. The two lectures which deal with this subject contain many considerations which are already familiar to those of our readers who have read "A Study of Religion." Dr. Caird's main argument for personal Immortality is identical with Dr. Martineau's, and rests on the perception of the inadequacy of this present life to allow of the due satisfaction of those infinite possibilities and aspirations—rational, ethical, æsthetic and spiritual—which arise in the spirit of man through the self-revelation of the Eternal God in the individual man and heart. Perhaps the most original and beautiful section in these two lectures is that in which Dr. Caird shows that there is a sense in which the "compensation argument" for immortality is both valid and forcible:—

> Though the compensation theory, in the crude form in which it has often been presented, is untenable, there is yet another aspect of it in which it is profoundly true. There are rewards in the spiritual life to which it is no selfishness to aspire—nay, which it is of the very essence of the spiritual life to seek after. There is no selfishness in a desire or aspiration which is in itself pure and noble, when it seeks for rewards in its own kind—in the desire of knowledge, for instance, when it seeks for ever larger and fuller opportunities and means of knowledge; or in the love of art, when it seeks by ever new and fairer creations to attain to an ever-advancing realisation of the beautiful. And this holds good in an especial manner of the moral and spiritual desires and affections. To seek the ever richer and fuller satisfaction of this order of desires is free from all taint of selfishness, because it is to seek after a joy which, whilst it is the sweetest of which the soul of man is capable, is in its own nature the death of selfishness—the joy of absolute self-surrender to the will of God, and of self-sacrifice for the good of others. "More life and fuller" than we have ever attained, or can hope on earth to attain, deeper draughts from the eternal springs of thought and joy than here we can ever experience—this, so far from being a sordid aspiration, is only another expression for the most exalted goodness.

We close our notice of these admirable Lectures with the feeling of warmest gratitude to their noble and gifted author, who has here presented to us a treasure-house of ideas as true and inspiring as they are charmingly expressed; but we cannot resist the conclusion that this great work would have been still more valuable and self-consistent had not the author in his treatment of the ethical aspects of Christianity been hampered by a nominal adhesion to an uncongenial philosophy, which identifies a man's real self with his character, and so renders genuine moral freedom and responsibility impossible; and in his representation of the Incarnation of God in Jesus by a too uncritical reverence for all the statements in the Scriptures, as well for the dogmas of that particular Church which his genius did so much to dignify and to adorn.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The question of the Housing of the Poor is dealt with in this month's Contemporary by Mr. Robert Donald, who shows what has been accomplished, and how much still remains to be done. The suggestions of the Royal Commission of 1884 have all been carried out, except the rating of vacant land; but the process of closing or demolishing houses "unfit for human habitation" requires to be greatly simplified, authorities must be enabled to acquire land outside their own borders, and there are other difficulties to be overcome before the people ejected from insanitary property will find proper accommodation. "Behind the housing problem," says Mr. Donald, "is the land problem." In the same review the Duchess of Sutherland describes the Lingfield settlement as "a Garden of Mercy," and Mr. Thomas Holmes, in an article on "Home Industries and Home Heroism," gives some terrible and pathetic pictures of the life of the most wretched dwellers in the city slums. There is also the first of two articles on "Monastic Orders up to Date," containing an indictment of "Roman Catholic Fetishism" from the point of view of a French liberal; an article on Ruskin by Miss Julia Wedgwood, who gives some interesting personal reminiscences, and finds the core of Ruskin's teaching in "his belief in beauty as a Divine sacrament," and looks upon him as one who gathered up "all that was best in spiritual democracy." The Hon. Stephen Coleridge writes on "Some London Hospitals and their Audited Accounts," objecting strongly to the use of funds subscribed for the care of the sick poor for the maintenance of physiological laboratories where vivisection is practised.

The Nineteenth Century again is strong in military articles. Dr. St. George Mivart, in an article on "Scripture and Roman Catholicism," explains that he wrote his former articles in the hope of vindicating the right of liberals to a place in the Roman Catholic Church, and at any rate to bring their position to a decisive test. He is now convinced "that there is, till Infallibility is repudiated, an absolute, impenetrable barrier between the domain of science and the Roman Catholic Church." Mrs. Hugh Bell writes on "Some Difficulties Incidental to Middle Age," and Miss Emily Hobhouse gives a most interesting account of information she has gathered, on behalf of the Women's Industrial Council, as to "Women Workers: How they live; how they wish to live." Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., replies to Sir Algernon West on the subject of the Majority and Minority Reports of the Licensing Commissioners.

In the Fortnightly the Hon. Stephen Coleridge writes on the "Cruelty to Animals Act of 1876," showing how a law which was intended rigorously to restrict the practice of vivisection, is, through the methods of administration adopted by the Home Secretary, practically inoperative, and might be more justly termed a law for the protection of vivisectors rather than of animals. Mr. H. Heathcote Statham writes what he regards as "The Truth about Ruskin," which is briefly that "he has little dependable or logical teaching to give in regard to art, but he has made thousands of persons care for it as they never cared for it before, and never would but for him." One of the most valuable of the articles in this number is by Professor Lewis Campbell "On some Liberal Movements of the last Half-century," dealing with the widening of theology, the abolition of religious tests and disabilities, and the extension of higher education; but what is meant by "the incorporation of Manchester New College into the University of Oxford"? Manchester College, on settling at Oxford, dropped the New out of its title, but it remains a Theological School outside the University.

Bedford College, London (for Women).—The Council will, in June next, award an additional science scholarship, the "Henry Tate Scholarship," of the value of £50 per annum for three years. This scholarship was endowed by the late Sir Henry Tate, and is to be for the first time awarded in science. The Committee of the Liberal Memorial to Mr. Gladstone have offered to the Council of Bedford College an annual prize of the value of £5, to be expended in books, to be given for proficiency in history, political science, or economics. The Council have decided to make this prize open for competition to all present students and all students who have left the College not more than one session. The first award will be made in the Easter term, 1901. The subject will be announced during next term. Mrs. H. J. Tennant (née Miss Abraham), formerly H.M.'s Superintending Inspector of Factories and Workshops, will lecture at Bedford College on March 7, five P.M., on "Industrial Life and Law." Cards of admission can be obtained at the College.

OBITUARY.

HARRIET KATHARINE MARRIOTT.

The numerous friends of Miss Marriott will have been grieved to hear of her unexpected decease on Feb. 28 at Sandal Grange, near Wakefield, the sad event occurring little more than a year after her esteemed father's death. It is only fitting that such a life as hers thus closed in its prime should have at least a brief memorial, though she always shrank from praise or publicity. Born into a family in which benevolence had become a tradition, a duty, and a habit, she early devoted herself to helpful service, and developed the strength of character which served her in good stead in after years. Many remember her when she approached her majority as a bright, unselfish, talented girl, whose life was full of the highest promise. But sad to tell, a great trouble came over her just as she had made so large a place in many hearts. One severe illness was succeeded by another, and left her delicate of physique, and liable to frequent periods of suffering. It might have been expected that this would cloud her buoyant spirits and check her active usefulness, but with remarkable fortitude and patience she sought to adjust her diminished strength to the best work that lay within her reach. In the home her charming social gifts and her winning kindness made her widely beloved, and among the poor and unfortunate she befriended many who were downcast and desolate. She was quick to perceive that such are best aided through hope and genuine sympathy, and, therefore, sought to make the material help serve as a stimulus to fresh personal effort.

Down to the very last, except in intervals of illness, her interest never wavered in any generous work that she had undertaken, and especially she assisted with the utmost loyalty and constancy in the chief activities of Westgate Chapel. Every worthy object in the congregation or the school found in her a warm supporter, and when at last she was compelled to retire from the teaching staff this was felt to be a most grievous loss. During the restoration of the chapel she laid the memorial block of the new vestry, and gave the beautifully-worked cover for the Communion table, which will now be a treasured memento of her taste and skill. She was, indeed, an artist from childhood, at home in the world of harmony, form, and colour, while no less versed in Nature's ways, and in the higher paths of culture. Her loss to the family circle must remain untold, and by many friends and fellow-workers it will be keenly felt. She was laid to rest near Westgate Chapel on Saturday, March 3, with evident signs of sorrow and tokens of affectionate respect. An impressive memorial service was conducted on the following morning by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, and in the afternoon, at a children's service, many of the gifts and kindly deeds of their departed friend were touchingly and gratefully recalled.

The march of humanity towards God's heavenly city resembles the walk of those pilgrims who, journeying to Jerusalem, after every three steps forwards, make one step backwards.—Jean Paul.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"So teach us to number our days."

To number means to count. You have all learned to count. I dare say you have forgotten that you ever had to learn it. It would seem strange to you to think of there being people in the world who can't count. People who can say one, two, and can't go further. There are such people. They can't distinguish between four, five, six; they can only say, many.

But you all can count. Sometimes you have a great deal of pleasure in counting. I saw a little boy, the other day, take the pennies and halfpennies out of his savings box, and count them. First he ranged them in rows along the table. There were several rows. Then he began to count from the rows as many pennies as would make a shilling, and to put each shilling's worth in a pile by itself. There were several piles, eight I think, and some halfpennies over. He took a great deal of pleasure in counting these piles, and then, that he might realise the better how rich he was, he counted them all over again.

Very likely you don't count your days just now, but I am quite sure you count your years. Seven years old, eight years old, ten years old, fourteen years old—why, how pleasant it is to count one's years, and feel oneself a year older! And when you have crossed the birthday into the next year, how very young and little-boyish or little-girlish seems the year you have stepped out of! You all like to count your years, and for a long while to come you will like to count them.

But this verse says "days." Count the days. Well, sometimes you do count the days. When the holidays are coming, or Christmas, or a party, you count the days. Now it is a fortnight, now it is a week, now it is to-morrow. Then the days go slowly. Or, perhaps, the holidays are coming to an end. In a few days the visit to the sea-side or the country will be over. You count the days left. Four more, two more. Now it is the last day. Oh, how quickly they have flown!

A day seems, perhaps, a very small bit of time to count. A thousand of them went by before you could count them. Three or four thousand more have gone by since. If you should live to be old you might have thirty thousand, or even more. How many days were there in that long life which you have heard spoken of with such reverence lately—in the ninety-four years of Dr. Martineau? How many were there in that other great life just passed from us—in the eighty years of Mr. Ruskin? Yes, a day is a small bit of time.

So is a halfpenny a small bit of money; yet you quite think it worth while to count the pennies and halfpennies.

And if you think about them you will see that the days and the halfpennies are alike in more ways than this one, of both being small.

What is the use of the pennies?—Why, to spend, of course. To buy something with. If you had to keep them as pennies, these dull round bits of metal would be of no use and no pleasure to you. But you exchange them for something else, which does serve or please you.

And the use of the days is to spend them—to exchange them for something else, also. And we may spend them wisely or foolishly, just as we do our pennies. What are we buying with our days?

Most of you go to school no doubt. Part of each day you spend in learning something. Well, that is a good exchange—a bit of time for a bit of knowledge. Some of you, perhaps, have work to do at home, or in the shop, or the office. In your way you are helping on this great world's business of living, and getting a living. You are spending the day in service. That is a good exchange, too—a piece of time against a piece of faithful, honest work. And all of you, I hope, have play days. Well, if the play is happy and innocent play, if you enjoy this beautiful world better for it, and feel more fellowship with other boys and girls in it, and go back to study or to work the fresher and the brighter for it, those days are well spent too. A bit of time for a bit of true pleasure, that is a good exchange.

But sometimes the days come to you, as they do to us, when you are dull, or cross, or idle, and nothing interests and nothing pleases; and when the day is over, one has to say, To-day is gone, and I haven't learned anything. I haven't done anything. I haven't enjoyed anything. My day is spent, and I have nothing for it—nothing at all.

Ah, there is one gain we may get even out of such a day, if we will only resolve not to spend any more so foolishly.

But there is one difference between the days and the pennies. If you don't want to spend your pennies to-day you can save them till to-morrow, till next year, till the time when you do want to spend them. I often think how nice if would be if there were only a bag or a box in which one could drop the five minutes or the half hours you don't want to use just now, the time one has to wait at the station for instance, and keep it till some time when you want every moment and feel you haven't half enough. But no bag or box has been yet made that the hours and the minutes won't slip through. Hold the days as tight as you can, yet you feel them slipping like sand through your fingers. You may spend your pennies, but you must spend your days. The only question is, What will you spend them for?

He who wrote about numbering or counting our days thought that wisdom was the great thing to change them for. All the wise men have thought so. And to help us remember the return each day may bring us, let us learn these lines about a day written by a wise man of our own century:—

So here hath been dawning
Another blue day;
Think, wilt thou let it
Slip useless away?

Out of eternity
This new day is born;
Into eternity
At night will return.

Behold it aforetime
No eye ever did;
So soon it for ever
From all eyes is hid.

Here hath been dawning
Another blue day;
Think, wilt thou let it
Slip useless away?

OUGHT WE TO BE SILENT?

This question we are compelled to ask ourselves, with reference both to The Inquirer itself and to the Memorial on the subject of the war in South Africa presented to Lord Salisbury by a number of our ministers, and published in our issue of Feb. 24. Of the large number of letters we have received on this subject some were published last week, and others will be found in our present issue. It is not possible for us to find room for the whole body of correspondence, and in making the necessary selection we have endeavoured to present both sides of the question as fully and fairly as might be. We trust that a consideration of the correspondence as it appears in these columns will at least prove that we have not shown any undue preference to letters with which we were able to agree. Correspondents who urge that it should be all or none, and make charges of unfairness when only some letters are published, cannot have realised the conditions under which alone such a public discussion of any burning question can be conducted. As in a public meeting the limit of time inevitably determines the number of speakers, so in a newspaper the limit of space.

A good many hard things have been said about the Ministers' Memorial, and it has been urged that they had no right to take such action without first consulting their congregations, or, at any rate, making it quite clear that they speak only for themselves, and not for their congregations. As to this latter point we cannot see that there is any ground for misunderstanding; the Memorial is perfectly straightforward in its wording, the ministers describe themselves as what they are, and there is no suggestion that they speak on behalf of their congregations. And, after all, as a body of men, they are members of a recognised profession, and, without any assumption of special authority, surely have a right to any common utterance to which they are impelled. Their utterance may be wise or foolish, well or ill-timed, but we cannot think that any large proportion of our people would deny to their ministers, either individually or collectively, the right of free speech in public on any matter which they felt to be of vital concern.

One rather severe critic, for whose long letter we have no space, is willing to receive from ministers instruction in theology, but says that he does not require their assistance in the matter of his political opinions. We are not aware that they have presumed to interfere in any way with his opinions, nor do we gather that he would deny to them the right of forming and expressing their own independent political opinions, lightly as he may regard their judgment in such matters. We have been reproached for saying that the question of the justice or injustice of the war is not a question of party politics. We can only repeat that, as we understand it, it is a question of national and of international concern, on which distinguished members of both political parties in this country are divided, and it is a question on which every citizen of the Empire is bound to the best of his ability to form an opinion, and if he have a strong conviction, then fearlessly to act upon it.

It is, no doubt, much easier and pleasanter to remain silent when one holds unpopular opinions, and it has been painful to us to know that the convictions with regard to the war expressed in The Inquirer during the past months are regarded with the strongest disfavour and dissent by a number of our readers. On which side the majority would be found we do not know, and have not considered it our business to inquire. What we are quite clear about is that, unless our religion is altogether vain, we must all be concerned with this matter, and with charitable judgment and generous consideration for the views of others, must see to it that we are true to our own convictions. The Inquirer may, for a time, have to bear the hostility or the cold neglect of some old friends, but it will rejoice, we are confident, in the earnest support of others, and the generous forbearance of the very large majority even of those who disapprove of its action in this matter, but who desire above all things, both in pulpit and Press, honest conviction and fearless utterance.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir,—To the majority of Unitarians your articles with reference to the war in South Africa are a source of great irritation.

As a matter of fact, you do not represent the views of Unitarians on this grave question; and it seems to many of your readers deplorable that you should, week after week, insert articles containing statements, based upon the gratuitous assumption that the cause of quarrel lies with our country, and that the Boers have been unjustly treated.

You attach undue importance to the opinions of Mr. Hobson, Mr. Bryce, and one or two others, while you ignore, or at best minimise, the evidence of those who have resided in South Africa, and who are therefore able to speak from experience.

To many, otherwise estimable people, it is a temptation to take sides with the minority upon any question, and this probably explains the fact why so many of our ministers signed the Memorial to Lord Salisbury.

Reading this manifesto, an outsider would naturally come to the conclusion that those who had signed it represented the views of the religious body of which they were members.

Was this the intention of the gentlemen who got up the petition? If so, then they have done us an injustice.

Judging by those whom I have spoken to on the subject, I have no hesitation in affirming that three out of every four Unitarians are convinced that this war is, so far as this country is concerned, a righteous one, rendered inevitable by the conduct of the Boers.

If The Inquirer is in future to be made use of for the purpose of propagating the views of a small section of our religious community, the sooner that fact is known the better.

It is to be hoped, however, that wiser counsels will prevail, and that our old denominational paper will cease to be used for the discussion of political questions, or for the dissemination of party views.

J. Moy Evans.

Swansea, March 6.

Sir,—In your last issue, a reviewer gives very high praise to Mr. Hobson's recent book. Will you allow me to say that at least two of Mr. Hobson's assertions cause me to doubt his accuracy and impartiality.

First, your reviewer says "the alleged 'Dutch conspiracy' vanishes before Mr. Hobson's examination." Now, I have just been reading a pamphlet entitled "A Century of Injustice," published under the auspices of F. W. Reitz, Secretary of State of the South African Republic. The following words conclude the pamphlet:—

"The hope which burned in our hearts when, in 1880, we began the struggle is not extinguished. The same flaming beacon guides us through floods of blood and tears, alas! and leads us to the most desired haven.

"We constitute the Union of South Africa.

"We need not blush before Europe either for what we have done, or for the flag we raise, or for the purpose we openly avow. . . .

"From the Zambesi to Simons Bay, let a unanimous shout arise: 'Africa to the Africanders!'"

When it is remembered that Mr. Kruger was the first, in his declaration of 1881, to use those selfsame words, "From the Zambesi to Simons Bay, Africa to the Africander," it seems to me that a Dutch conspiracy to oust the British from South Africa is not quite such a myth as Mr. Hobson and his reviewer would maintain.

Secondly, Mr. Hobson says: "Dutch and British South Africans do not widely differ in their view of native questions."

I have gathered a most distinctly opposite view from several writers, and especially from M. J. Villarais, who has been a resident in the Transvaal. In the Bibliothèque Universelle, of Lausanne, the most important Swiss review (February, 1900), he clearly shows the great difference between the Boer and the British treatment of the natives. The Boer laws do not allow the native, in his own country, to possess or even to rent the smallest particle of land, while the British law allows the native tribes to hold property in common, and native individuals who have shown proof of civilisation to hold personal property on the same conditions as Europeans. The Boer laws impose upon the natives a yearly tax of £2 12s.; the British tax is only 10s. The Boer laws exclude all natives from the franchise. The British law grants the natives, who have separated from their tribe, to live among Europeans, the right of vote subject to the same provisions as the Europeans. The difference is so great according to M. Villarais, that he characterises the Boer system towards the natives by the name of feudalism, and the British system by the name of education.

And M. Villarais is a foreigner and an outsider. James Hocart.

Brussels, March 5.

[The question of the alleged "Dutch Conspiracy" is not settled by quoting the aspiration of President Kruger and those who share his views, it involves the Free State and the Dutch of Cape Colony. Mr. Hobson does not make any mere assertion, but brings forward a large body of evidence to show that the "conspiracy" as alleged did not exist, and that the loyalty, especially of Mr. Hofmeyr and the Dutch Africander leaders at the Cape, to the Queen and the British flag, was perfectly sincere, and unshaken. Whether that loyalty can be maintained after the present war will depend, no doubt, on the nature of the settlement arrived at. As to the native question, Mr. Hobson draws a clear distinction between British law and the opinion and practice of British South Africans. As to the latter, we advise Mr. Hocart, if he is inclined to distrust Mr. Hobson, to read Mr. Fox Bourne's pamphlet.—Ed. Inq.]

Sir,—Mr. Byles writes in a friendly spirit which I would cordially reciprocate, but I think he hardly realises how unmeaning he makes his memorial when he claims my signature for it. He issued his circular about "Stopping the War," before tidings came even of the relief of Kimberley. I think the war must go on until the Boers are as thoroughly defeated as were the Southerners in the American Civil War. Yet he claims my signature on the ground that I desire, equally with himself, to see a lasting peace established in South Africa. Why, Sir, we all desire this. The difference of opinion in the country, and it is a difference wide and deep, is in regard to the way in which we believe such a peace may be secured. Mr. Jacks may well ask what is the good of signing a memorial which is silent on this all-important point? The trumpet has uttered a most uncertain sound, and totally diverse opinions are known to be held among those who have appended their names to this public document which professes to represent us before the country.

One word with regard to the question of responsibility for the war. All last summer the Boers might have secured themselves against any danger of our attacking their independence by admitting the Outlanders to their franchise on reasonable terms, and by allotting to the Rand not a majority, but less than one-third of the seats in the Volksraad. Rather than do this, they deliberately chose war, knowing what magnificent preparations they had made for war, and what a military advantage they could secure by invading our comparatively undefended Colonies. This seems to me to be the large fact which dwarfs everything else into insignificance. This is the reason why we must now fight until we can secure South Africa against the existence of any military force in future except what is under our own control, and make it imperative that future disputes between white men shall be fought out at the ballot-box by those having equal political rights.

The most hopeful promise of enduring peace after the war is over comes in the tidings of how Cronje's soldiers fraternised with our troops immediately after the capitulation, and how the prisoners went off to Capetown as happily as if they were on a holiday excursion. The average Boer will be perfectly content with the Home Rule that we shall be only too glad to give him, when once he has learned the impossibility of achieving racial ascendency by force of arms.

Finally, Sir, whatever our differences, let us not allow these to blind any of us to the splendid heroism which has been displayed in the defence and the relief of Ladysmith. The days we are living in are making history on which patriotism will be fed for centuries to come. Let us not lose our own share in this noble addition to our national inheritance.

H. Shaen Solly.

Bridport, March 7.

[That "all last summer the Boers might have secured themselves," &c., seems to us the most astonishing assertion. That is the very point on which judgments are in absolute conflict, but this is perhaps hardly the time to argue the point We must now wait to see what terms of settlement are proposed.—Ed. Inq.]

Sir,—With reference to your commendatory notice of Mr. Hobson's book on the "War in South Africa," will you allow me to point out to your readers the fact that the Christian World (March 1, p. 7) gives an altogether different estimate of the book. Its remarks are quite brief, but they are very much to the point, and will be helpful to those whom you beg to give the most careful and unprejudiced consideration to Mr. Hobson's book.

F. T. Reed.

[Mr. Hobson has no great faith in the Outlanders' demand for the Franchise. The Christian World says: "We happen to have the testimony of the leading Nonconformist ministers of Johannesburg that there was a universal resentment of the predominant English population against their humiliating exclusion from political rights and the oppression of the Boers." We can only urge again that Mr. Hobson's book should be read.—Ed. Inq.].

THE MINISTERS' MEMORIAL.

Sir,—I am one of the Unitarian laymen who wonder why Unitarian ministers should consider it fitting to separate themselves from their fellows in order to pronounce on a question of the day.

When I left an orthodox body in my youth, I came to appreciate the freedom from clerical authority that I was to enjoy in my new surroundings. But to see the list of 156 signatures in last week's Inquirer, labelled by themselves as Unitarian ministers (there are, I believe, over 200 others who have not appended their names), has made me wonder where I am. Cannot our ministers demonstrate without separating themselves from their fellows?

I will not now deal with the question of the day involved; each of us is, no doubt, fully persuaded in his own mind.

Feb. 28. H. Epps.

Sir,—I am sorry for my friend Mr. Jacks. His own reputation can hardly fail to suffer in the general lowering of "the reputation of our ministry for moral earnestness and common-sense." True, he has done his best to clear himself of all complicity in our guilt and foolishness, but the names of his own former teachers and intimate friends are among the signatories of the "meaningless document" he denounces, and unfortunately it has been published far and wide beyond the range of The Inquirer's circulation and of his letter of protest.

And he points out how gratuitous has been our offence. "No Government waging a just war needs to be memorialised to take the earliest available opportunity to make peace." They would put aside at once all thoughts of revenge or gain or glory, and be merciful in the terms dictated to a prostrate foe. It has always been so!

But a Government so peacefully disposed, when conscious that right was on their side, cannot be imagined capable of waging an unjust war, or neglecting an opportunity of peace just because the war was unjust.

So ministers of religion can sit at ease while war rages, feeling that their function in the community is to adapt "Rule Britannia" to sacred measures, and preach (as Ian Maclaren has set us the example) that "God is the God of England" and her mission to civilise the world, and that having "found out who are our enemies, we are not going to forget them." By so doing we shall earn the congratulations of our congregations (as a Baptist minister tells us in a recent letter he did by a sermon in defence of the war), and all men will speak well of us, and praise us as a patriotic and level-headed set.

It is tempting, but strikes me as hardly worth the price. So I stand with those who would urge upon the Government, whether it be willing or unwilling, "peace at the earliest opportunity" that it can be safely made, without, however, presuming to dictate to them the terms upon which it should be made.

Charles Hargrove.

P.S.—It strikes me, in reading over the last sentence of my letter, that it might possibly seem to hint at unworthy motives in the minds of ministers who take a different view of the war to what I do. God forbid that I should make so evil and stupid a charge against my friends and brethren! I would say only that if we take the popular side we must have good reason for doing so, and if we are on the unpopular side we are bound to come forward and say so.

VEGETARIAN TABLE AT THE CONFERENCE.

Sir,—The Leicester Committee of the Triennial Conference have very considerately arranged to provide a "Vegetarian Table" at each of the luncheons; it will greatly facilitate arrangements if all ministers, delegates, and visitors to the Conference who intend to avail themselves of this accommodation will communicate with me at the earliest possible.

LONDON PERMANENT CHAPEL BUILDING FUND.

Sir,—Will you allow us to draw the attention of your readers to one point with regard to the London Permanent Chapel Building Fund which, we think, may have been overlooked by many.

Under the scheme for the use of the money, one-third will be applied to relieve existing congregations in London of their debts and encumbrances, and the remaining two-thirds will form the nucleus of a Permanent Loan Building Fund.

This Fund will be managed by twelve trustees, who are to be elected in the first instance by the Council of Ministers and Delegates of the London Chapels, and all the Subscribers to the Fund.

As the Fund will be permanent, and will, no doubt, be added to from time to time by further donations and legacies, it is of the greatest importance that the trustees, who will have the management of it, shall be most carefully selected. We would, therefore, urge all those London Unitarians who have not yet contributed to the Fund, to do so in order that we may have their help in electing those who will administer.

We shall be glad to be able to announce a list of cash contributions amounting to £10,000 before the Bazaar opens in May.

Chairman of Committee.

THE LONDON BAZAAR.

Sir,—May I appeal, through the medium of your paper, to those of our friends who have gardens and glasshouses on behalf of the Flower-stall at the forthcoming Bazaar. Contributions of ferns of all sorts, palms, crotons, and other foliage plants, spring and conservatory flowers, will be most acceptable; while early roses, forced fruit and asparagus would add a considerable increase to the exchequer, and would enable this stall, which is a kind of orphan, having no church to be its father or mother, to hold its own with the larger and, therefore, better provided stalls. As I am anxious to avoid unnecessary expenditure, I shall feel grateful if our friends will let me know at an early date what they will probably be able to send me, that I may curtail my orders at a florist's. Money in lieu of flowers, &c., would be judiciously applied. Amie Preston.

We do not begin to recognise the worth of even our nearest human friends. With a wealth of precious love and almost infinite tenderness they move beside us along the years; but their gait is plain, and we do not see the splendour that is in them. It would be well were we to pray to have our eyes opened that we might see the common angels God sends to bless our lives.—J. R. Miller.

A thought continued in adds to itself; a state of mind grows in proportion as we permit ourselves to dwell upon it, whereas ideas to which we give no attention depart from us. Attention, therefore, is the keynote. The mind can be absorbed by but one object at a time. If we would be free from wrong thoughts, we must turn positively away from them to other thoughts.—In Search of a Soul.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of the above Association was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Monday, March 5. Tea and coffee were served from 6.15 to 7 o'clock, when the chair was taken by the President, the Rev. George Knight.

The report stated that the work of the Association had been steadily maintained, the greatest care having been bestowed on the building schemes in connection with the forward movement centres.

The Urmston Church was formally opened on Jan. 27, and the Bradford building was fast nearing completion. The year had been a notable one in the history of the church of Chorlton-cum-Hardy, not only by reason of the congregation having had the benefit for the first time of a settled minister of its own, but also by reason of the strenuous efforts made to so increase the new church building fund as to justify the commencement of building operations. The main energies of the Gorton Church had been directed towards the erection of the new Sunday-school, and it was proposed to hold a bazaar in the new school in November, 1900. While it was true that the Committee had money to meet the expense of building, they would still need a considerable sum to enable them to lay out the grounds, furnish the school, and do other things that were necessary. Two memorial-stones were laid on June 24, 1899, by two former members of the church—namely, Captain Fred Peacock and Mr. Robert Clay. Considerable progress had been made with the building, and it was expected that in the course of three or four months the work would be completed. It was the unanimous opinion of the Committee of the Heaton Moor Church that a building of their own was essential to success, and the governing body of the Association had decided to press forward with the work, and it was hoped that ere the next report was issued this congregation would be in a home of its own. The Longsight congregation anticipated that there would be a total deficit on the past year (bazaar fund and church current account included) of about £70. The contract for the new church in Moss Side had been given to Mr. William Thorpe, builder, Manchester, and the building was to be completed by March, 1901. The estimated cost was nearly £6,000. A grant at the rate of £28 per annum had been made during the past year in aid of the ministry at Oldham-road. The appointment of a suitable resident minister at Urmston was generally felt to be a pressing need, so that the work in the new building might be carried forward with steady gain of members and increase of usefulness. It had been decided that the churches of this district should co-operate in providing a Manchester district stall for the London Bazaar next May, and a committee of ladies was formed, and it was expected that all the churches would see their way to render some help in this connection. Something should be said about the general financial condition of the Association. The governing body would earnestly beg every member of every congregation in the district to consider whether he or she could not in some way or other give increased assistance towards the carrying on of their work. When, in 1893, the Forward Movement scheme was proposed, some may have doubted its success; but much had happened since then. Under the devoted care and earnest labours of their missionaries this branch of their work had increased, and with its growth their financial responsibility had grown also. The Forward Movement had been sustained during the past six years by a comparatively small number of persons.

The Treasurer's statement showed that the income of the General Fund was £217 13s. 4d., and of the Forward Movement Fund £562 4s. 5d., which included grants amounting to £112 from the B. and F.U.A., and £89 transferred from the General Fund. The balance was on the right side.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the Report, said that before this year was out he expected that the four Mission Churches would all be completed and occupied. He had preached in the new building at Urmston, and was surprised at its external beauty and its internal convenience and comfort. The people there now had a grand opportunity; and they were thankful for the help which had rendered their progress possible. The Bradford building would be opened in a few weeks, and Heaton Moor and Chorlton were hoping to commence building operations in a few weeks. At each Forward Movement centre the friends were cheerful and earnest, for they felt that God had given them a work to do, and they are determined by God's grace and inspiration to worthily accomplish it. Ten out of twenty-two of the churches had held sales of work during the year, perhaps in some cases to meet hard times. Notwithstanding all the activities referred to in the Report, there was still larger work to do. There is no standing still. Their movement was forward. Resources must come from somewhere. They ought ere now to have been finding their way into some of the other districts. Had they been on the watch for the beckoning finger of God? The function of their churches must be missionary, and he hoped their ideals would fix themselves in some further work for God and man. Why should they not have an income of £1,000 a year? It would not be too much. There was plenty of money amongst them; their generosity only wanted leading. Their generous friends ought not to forget the needs of their own Association, which was so often pulled up by the thought, "But where is the money to come from? This ought not to be, and would not be, were its friends to make up their minds to support adequately its aims and work.

The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, was present and addressed the meeting. He said he was specially interested in the Forward Movement work, and in the efforts of the Postal Mission which was seed-sowing of a most important character. He thought we did not canvas earnestly enough for the half-crown or shilling subscription. He had visited about 200 of our churches up and down the country, and he thought there was no occasion for despairing; on the contrary we never were so strong, never were our prospects brighter, than at the present time. Outside our churches there is a large Unitarian public. Though the name had not yet become popular, he felt sure it would be in time. As it was, modern Unitarianism was much more rapid in growth than was Christianity in the first era of its life. The true Unitarian, however, cares not so much for numbers as for principles. Their work should be missionary in spirit, for such was the example set by Jesus.

Mr. T. F. Robinson, speaking as a member of the governing body, said that it had lately been almost impossible to consider the larger concern of the churches owing to the details of the Forward Movement work. He felt sure that the new churches would be successful, and yet the older churches wanted developing at the same time. They were lacking somewhat in unity of purpose; but that might be owing to so many of the individual churches being absorbed in finding out how to square their balance sheets. They had a gospel of which they were proud; but they got very easy going in connection with their churches, and only occasionally was their enthusiasm aroused. He did not think that Unitarianism in Manchester was stronger than hitherto; but the reverse. There was more limited representation amongst the public men who are uplifting and improving the condition of the poor. There was lack of enthusiasm; and that Association could do something to remedy it. It might organise meetings at the various churches and stir up a larger life. He thought Mr. Roper's plan of campaign was calculated to largely meet the case.

The Rev. Priestley Prime said that the central truth of their faith upon which they were all agreed was that God was Father, that He was present throughout His universe, not shut up in a church, nor exclusively in one man's soul or in a priesthood, but in the souls of all human beings. If it is right, therefore, for any human being to take any part whatever in social questions, it must be in a religious spirit. Art, if it is right art, is religion; and so is right music, for they are a means of uplifting men towards God. In business, too, there should be the expression of the religious life. Some of us are not sufficiently intense; our interests are spread over too wide an area. In our Church life we need to bring the devotional life more intensely home to ourselves by all possible means; then we can go forth into all parts of the world with a message that will bless. He noticed that in furnishing new churches, they thought they could do without kneeling cushions if money was a bit short. The primary thing needed was an increase of the true devotional spirit which regarded the service as more important than the sermon.

During the evening the choir of the Strangeways Unitarian Free Church rendered a pleasing programme of anthems and solos.

After the usual votes of thanks had been accorded, the choir sang an anthem, and the Chairman closed the meeting with a benediction.

Our report of the annual meeting of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, held at Leigh on Tuesday, we hope to publish next week.

The ship may sink, and I may drink
A hasty death in the bitter sea;
But all that I leave in the ocean grave
Can be slipped and spared, and no loss to me.

What care I though falls the sky,
And the shrivelling earth to a cinder turn?
No fires of doom can ever consume
What never was meant nor made to burn.

Let go the breath! There is no death
To the living soul, nor loss, nor harm;
Not of the clod is the life of God,
Let it mount, as it will, from form to form.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE.

Of the churches in this district there is no very striking or startling news to relate. Plenty of work is being done, on the usual lines, and with results which cannot be expressed in comparative statistics. Tea parties, bazaars, sales of work, debating societies, bands of hope, sewing circles, &c., are names which do not suggest spiritual ideas; yet even such things may, and in many cases do, contribute to the spiritual life of those who take part in them. If, however, I were to fill this letter with details of such activities, it would be merely to tell what the members of every congregation know (or should know) already. It will be of more interest to the readers of The Inquirer, if I tell them something about an experiment, on lines not usual in our churches, which is now being tried in Bury. The Rev. J. C. Odgers has for some months held week-evening services (on alternate Wednesdays), and the experiment seems to be justified by the appreciation shown. I cannot do better than quote Mr. Odgers' own words to describe the intention and origin of these services, as explained in a letter to me. He says "They were the outcome of two considerations. (1) The question of trying to do something to bridge over the gulf between Sunday-school and chapel had been for long exercising my thought. If the school would not go to the chapel, might not the chapel go to the school? If so few adult scholars attended religious services in the chapel, might not an occasional religious service, apart from the Sunday-school routine, be conducted with advantage on their own premises? And if they acquired a liking for them, might they not be induced to become regular members of the congregation?

"(2) I had in previous winters conducted a teachers' class on week-evenings, attended by fifteen or twenty teachers, sometimes less." . . . At Bristol, a teachers' class had developed into a week-night service, 'and still supplied teachers with something which would prove useful to them in their preparation for their classes.' I thought I might follow suit.

"The attendance has been from eighty to one hundred persons, old and young, even in the worst of weather. Such services have been appreciated in unexpected ways. Some of the very poorest persons attend, because the service is less formal than in the chapel; no Sunday clothes need be donned and no one need be oppressed by the magnificence of Gothic arches and stained-glass windows. As to method we have a good deal of singing, and occasionally a solo. Before the first lesson I announce my subject for the evening, and read some verses from the Bible in exemplification, with perhaps two minutes' talk about it. The second lesson is from modern poetry, on the same lines. The address (extempore) takes up the teaching of the two previous readings, and developes it with all kinds of illustrations. Hymns are carefully chosen to suit, when possible. So the teachers present have something clear and straight to take away with them; whilst (I hope) the younger scholars have something to interest them. For the weary and heavy-laden I hope I provide something also. The service avoids theological disputes, and is of a devotional character. A poor woman, who is a Primitive Methodist, comes in and enjoys them. We start punctually at 8 P.M., and close at 9."

I make no apology (except to Mr. Odgers) for quoting this most interesting account of an earnest attempt to solve a difficult problem. It is only fair to let the originator speak for himself. One main cause for the good result, so far, of the experiment Mr. Odgers himself could not mention, perhaps is unaware of; but it will be no secret to those who know the quality (and the quantity) of the work that he does in Bury.

The question of adopting the plan of week-night services is one which each congregation must decide for itself, according to its own sense of what is necessary and what is possible in its own locality. I may mention, however, that week-evening services are held at Newchurch. There was a paragraph about them in The Inquirer of Nov. 4 last, amongst the other "News from our Churches." It would be interesting to hear whether the same plan has been adopted in other places, and if so, with what results.

In previous letters I have usually said something, perhaps too much, about the work of the N. and E. Lancashire Unitarian Mission and of its relations with the several congregations, assisted and self-supporting. That is a subject upon which, in the present condition of its finances, I could write much. But I refrain from doing so, as the annual meeting to be held at Leigh on March 6 will no doubt be reported in The Inquirer, and I should not like to tax the patience of readers by enlarging on the same subject, possibly in the same number.

I content myself, accordingly, with the report I have given of what seems to me the most interesting factor in the present activity of our churches in this district.

R. Travers Herford.

Stand, March 1.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—On the evenings of March 1, 2, and 3 drawing-room concerts were held in the Unitarian School in aid of the school funds. The room was carpeted, furnished, and decorated with palm ferns and pictures, under the direction of Miss M. A. Taylor. Alderman Haywood presided on the first evening, when many outside friends gave valuable musical help. The second evening was arranged for the children, who contributed the chief part of the programme themselves, Mr. E. Mills presiding. On the Saturday Councillor John Taylor was in the chair, and besides solos and duets, choice selections were given by Mr. G. T. Fletcher's Orchestral Band.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—The annual meeting of the Waverley-road Congregation was held on Saturday, Feb. 17. The sixth annual report of the Committee recorded a successful year's work. There had been an increase of subscribing members, and the amount received from offertories and subscriptions showed a gratifying increase upon previous years. The Committee placed on record their appreciation of the faithful and earnest labours of the minister, the Rev. Harrold Johnson, B.A., during the past year, and gratitude for the good work done. The Sunday-school had done steady and earnest work during the past year. There are now 100 children on the books, average attendance eighty, with ten teachers. Encouraging statistics were also given of the Literary and Social Union, the Library, the Ladies' Sewing Meeting, and the Ruskin Guild of Needlework.

Blackley.—A jumble sale, in aid of the New School Fund, was held on Saturday last, and realised £16. A concert, given recently with the same object, resulted in a profit of £10 14s. 6d. The annual congregational party took place lately, and was a most encouraging occasion. Very helpful addresses were delivered by the Revs. G. Knight, C. Roper, W. R. Shanks, and J. W. Bishop The new school is to be built this year, and much hearty work is being done for it.

Bolton: Bank-street (Appointment).—Mr. E. Saville Hicks, B.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, to become assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., in succession to the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., who enters on his ministry at Preston in June.

Bradford.—The annual congregational tea party was held on Shrove Tuesday, and the subsequent soirée in the Channing Hall was well attended. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who presided, referred to the evident progress the church was making. He hoped that when the war cloud had disappeared enthusiasm would be directed to other channels, so that no good cause should languish for the want of adequate support. Mr. Byron Boothroyd, senior warden, made a statement regarding the numerical progress of the congregation and the work of renovating the chapel, which is now approaching completion. Short addresses were also delivered by Mr. J. G. Slater, Miss Hudson, Mr. K. Baines, and Mr. H. C. McMurtrey. A varied programme of music was rendered, under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Moxon.

Chatham.—On Wednesday last Mrs. Wood and Miss Tribe gave a tea and distributed prizes to the children attending the Hamond-hill Sunday-school. The lady-teachers managed the tea arrangements, the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock, B.A., and the other teachers undertaking the conduct of the entertainment afterwards. Mrs. Wood congratulated the scholars on their good conduct and progress; and Mr. C. Abbott, the honorary secretary of the school, said they numbered at present about ninety children, and were rapidly increasing. The choir of the church, under the direction of the organist, Mr. F. Daniels, rendered much assistance.

Dover.—On Tuesday week the Adrian-street Band of Hope gave a successful entertainment at the Lecture Hall, Russell-street, lent for the occasion. A miscellaneous programme was followed by a fairy adaptation from Cinderella.

Forest Gate.—The congregation is trying to effect some needed improvements in the lighting and ventilation of the building in Upton-lane. They hope to be able to instal the electric light, which is accessible and cheap. Mr. Perris lately revisited Hull for lecturing purposes, and he has since addressed a large Sunday afternoon audience in the Methodist Free Church here, and lectured on "John Ruskin" to the Literary Society at the Y.M.C.A. Conference Hall, West Ham-lane, Stratford.

Gloucester.—Among those who took part in the annual banquet on St. David's Day, held at the New Inn Hotel, were Professor John Rhys and the Revs. Walter Lloyd and J. Fisher Jones. On the toast "The Bishops, Clergy and Ministers of all Denominations," Mr. Lloyd responded for the Nonconformists, and said that his nonconformity had been no barrier to friendly intercourse with the clergy of the city. He caused some amusement by saying that Professor Rhys, in proposing the toast of St. David, had forgotten to say that that great national saint was a Nonconformist. In those days all the British were Nonconformists, for they would not conform to the Church of Rome. When he remembered the services rendered to England by Nonconformity during the last 250 years, he was proud to be himself a Nonconformist.

Highgate.—A united social gathering of the North London Unitarian Churches will be held at the Highgate Church (Highgate-hill, corner of Despard-road) on Thursday evening, March 15, from 7.30 to 10.30, to meet the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, M.A.

Kilmarnock.—On Wednesday, Feb. 28, a lecture was given by the Rev. A. C. Henderson, M.A., B.D., in the Hall, Dunlop-street, under the auspices of the educational department of the Kilmarnock Equitable Co-operative Society, the subject being "Electricity." The hall was crowded, and the lecture was much appreciated. There was also a musical programme, in which the Co-operative band took a prominent part.

London: Peckham.—The annual congregational meeting of the Avondale-road Church was well attended on Tuesday last, under the presidency of the Rev. G. Carter. Reports were rendered by the hon. secretary (Mr. W. J. Corley), and the hon. treasurer (Mr. A. G. Stoessiger). The former recorded steady application in all departments of church work, though with no increase in membership. The Sunday-school had shown signs of improvement; the Band of Hope was prospering; interesting and successful meetings of the Literary Society had been held; the gymnasium included a fair proportion of the young men and lads of the congregation, and, like the Literary Society, had been able to make a subscription to the church funds; the mothers' meetings had been small, but useful service had been rendered to the few who had attended. The treasurer's report acknowledged retrogression, for, whereas the financial year had opened with a small balance, it had closed with a rather large deficit. Reasons were given for this which appeared to justify the hope that the trouble would not be recurrent. Among the complimentary votes was one warmly acknowledging the honorary services of the organist (Mr. R. Whitmore Cox) and his wife.

Manchester.—Mr. John H. Leigh, M.A., of London, gave a reading of Shakespeare's Hamlet in the Memorial Hall, Wednesday evening, Feb. 28, in aid of the funds of the Manchester Domestic Mission. The play was condensed and arranged in three acts, and the overture, preludes, and incidental music had been specially composed for this reading by Dr. Ernest Walker. Mr. Leigh's effort gave great satisfaction and delight to those who were present. He brought out all the points of the play with intelligent emphasis, and his elocution was of a very finished character. He made his audience feel throughout that they were listening not merely to an elocutionist, but also to a cultured student of Shakespeare. In representing the minor characters, Mr. Leigh was capable of varied tone and style; but it was in the principal character, Hamlet, that the reader's finest power was displayed. He entered into the height and depth of Hamlet's cunning and passion, rendering the various passages of banter or denunciation with a finish and a confidence only to be expected in the professional. Mr. Leigh is to be heartily congratulated upon his successful condensation of Hamlet, which brought the reading within the limits of two and a-quarter hours. This was the first opportunity most of the audience had of hearing Mr. Leigh; but they look forward to a further acquaintance with so scholarly and polished a reader.

Mansfield (Appointment).—The announcement appears in Thursday's Manchester Guardian that the Rev. E. I Fripp, of all Souls' Church, Belfast, has accepted an invitation from his old congregation at the Old Meeting, and will enter on his second ministry at Mansfield at the beginning of June.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—A meeting of the Lay-Preachers' Union was held on Wednesday evening, Feb. 28, in the school-room of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, the Rev. John Harrison, of West Bromwich, presiding, when a paper was read by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, of Gateshead, on "Martineau's Sermons." The reader said that the literature of our country had been enriched from time to time by contributions from the pulpit, and that Martineau was the greatest sermon-writer England has produced. Gems of thought and gems of style can alike be collected from his pages; passages which are pure poetry in all save form; high soaring rhapsodies which beat against the limitations of our language as they seek to make known those spiritual delights into which the preacher has such free entrance; masterly unveilings of sophistries; impassioned appeals to higher instincts; solemn warnings to the self-satisfied; sympathetic insight into the causes of much of human woe—these, which are by no means the exclusive possession of any one preacher, manifest themselves in such abundance in Martineau, and are moreover so unreservedly associated with a fearless rational theology, that no matter from what point considered his sermon-literature remains the finest the language boasts. Concluding, Mr. Harvie said, not as models for sermon-writers to unswervingly follow, nor chiefly as examples of English literature at its best, but as aids to the deepening and strengthening of the Inner Life are the sermons of Martineau commended to all. We can only teach out of the store of our own experience: the one lesson the world wants is the knowledge of the Most High: shall not we, then, be wise to sit at the feet of one whose life and word alike testify that he has been with God? Additional interest was given to the meeting by the reading of several letters which had been sent to Mr. Robert Wilson, of Newcastle, by the late Dr. Martineau, extending over a great number of years.

Pontypridd.—On Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25, Mrs. John Lewis, of Top-hill, delivered an interesting address on "Postal Mission Work," quoting many testimonies to the helpfulness of this method of reaching inquiring minds, and people hungering for religious sympathy. A collection was made at the close of the service in aid of the Mission.

Sale (Resignation).—The Rev. James Forrest, M.A., has resigned the pastorate of the Sale congregation, announcing that his ministry there will terminate at the end of May. At a meeting of the members of the church, a resolution was passed accepting the resignation with regret. This announcement has been received with much sorrow by Mr. Forrest's friends at Sale, who have found a constant source of inspiration and help in his teaching. His attitude towards the pressing social problems of the day has always been one of fearless loyalty to truth, and this, joined to his boundless faith in humanity and in its ultimate salvation, has given him a power for good which is irresistibly felt by those with whom he has come into contact. At the usual weekly meeting of the Social Guild, a paper was read by Mr. Forrest on "Education: What it is and what it should be." He condemned the present educational methods, which ignore the fundamental aim of true education to draw out the natural faculties and train and discipline the mind to a sense of the obligations of human life. He lamented the indifference manifested in regard to the qualifications of teachers, and that, although their functions are of the most vital importance to society, their position is so little esteemed. He strongly advocated that the duties of the State in regard to education are of paramount importance, and that education should be free.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—Last Sunday morning the Rev. J. E. Manning preached a memorial sermon on the death of the late Mr. Benjamin Greaves. Their friend, Mr. Manning said, was of a singularly winning character. A man interested in many directions, in education, in politics, in economic questions; but it was not this that left an abiding impression on you—it was his simplicity of character, its essential goodness. He was very generous to the poor, and did good by stealth. No real case of distress ever appealed to Mr. Greaves in vain. It was quite in harmony with his prevailing modesty of character that he subsidised a course of lectures given about a year ago in the Montgomery Hall. It was a conviction with him that people generally, and perhaps an industrial population like that of Sheffield especially, should have a better knowledge than is usually possessed by the working classes of political economy, and he therefore was desirous that subjects arising out of economic considerations should be expounded by competent teachers, and discussed freely and openly. And so he took care that such lectures were given; and had he lived, another series would have been given this year. Such a man is a public benefactor, however careful he may be that his name is concealed. A blameless life was his, and he leaves behind the memory of a kindly Christian gentleman. At the close of the service a meeting of the congregation was held in Channing Hall under the presidency of Mr. M. J. Hunter, chairman of trustees, and a resolution expressive of the high appreciation of Mr. Greaves' character and worth was passed, and of sympathy and condolence with his widow. This was proposed by Mr. George H. Hunt, seconded by Mr. William Laycock, and supported by Mr. J. B. Wostinholm and the chairman. Much deep regret was expressed at his untimely death.

Shrewsbury.—The annual meeting of the High-street congregation was held on Sunday evening last. The Committee's report referred to the recent illness of their minister (Rev. James C. Street), and expressed the hope that now he was again restored to his usual health and vigour, he would long be spared to carry on his good and noble work among them. The report was a very satisfactory one, and showed that the congregation had been very active during the year. Mr. Street conducts a week-evening service, which is much enjoyed by the members and friends. The Sunday-school, under the able superintendence of Mrs. Myers, is in a healthy condition and doing good work. The attendance and conduct of the scholars is excellent. Two scholars made the full possible attendances during 1899, and were never once late. The schoolroom has been completely refurnished—including piano, organ, and good library. The Band of Hope continues to hold meetings and is doing well. A member of the congregation has kindly fitted (at his own expense) the church and schoolroom with the electric light, which was used last Sunday for the first time. The beautiful electroliers add greatly to the effect of the church, and the new light is a decided improvement.

South Cheshire Association.—The winter meeting of the South Cheshire and District Association and Sunday School Union was held in Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, on the 28th ult., under the presidency of the Rev. G. A. Payne. At the conference after the committee meeting, the Rev. J. C. Street said that when he was requested to give a talk on "How to Extend the Work of the Association," he had readily consented, thinking he would have much to say. But when he came to consider the matter, he was at once confronted by the financial difficulty of missionary enterprise. They had meagre funds; they were not a wealthy band of churches. If the financial problem could be solved, he would earnestly plead for the inclusion of "lay" helpers in the work of preaching, who should occupy the pulpits of such ministers as might be engaged in the mission field. He also urged cottage services, and suggested an exchange once a year of all the ministers in the Union Further, since it was helpful to each to know the others' activities, he advocated the issue of a monthly leaflet or calendar in common. The Rev. H. D. Roberts thought the financial difficulty might be overcome; and the discussion of Mr. Street's proposals was continued by the Revs. J. K. Montgomery, G. A. Payne, R. S. Redfern, J. M. Mills, and Messrs. Nicholson and Mansell. On the motion of Mr. A. Orrett, seconded by Mr. Vickery, it was resolved "That the General Committee be instructed to consider the questions of 'lay' preachers, monthly leaflets, and outside missionary work; and report to a future meeting." Appreciative mention was made of Mr. Morley Mills' services as hon. sec. of the Union. Tea was served in the schoolroom, and a vote of thanks accorded to the ladies who assisted. The public religious service was conducted by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, who in his sermon showed by various analogies from nature and history, that the constructive and benevolent, in both natural and moral worlds, are generally wrought out in the strength of silence; while the destructive and harmful are accompanied by noisy force. So beauty of life and sincerity of effort, however quiet and obscure and unmarked, cannot be in vain in the eternal scheme of good. The proceedings throughout passed off very satisfactorily.

Stalybridge.—During Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday last week a very successful bazaar was held in the large schoolroom to raise funds to build a chancel and transept for the church, and to enclose and plant with trees a piece of land behind the church, which has been given to the congregation. Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., opened the bazaar on the first day, and had a crowded audience. The Rev. W. Harrison presided, and in introducing Sir John, gave an account of the congregation. They were, he said, one of a numerous family of Unitarian congregations within a radius of four or five miles from that building. He sometimes took his stand not far from his own door, and looked upon a picture that could be seen nowhere else in England. Twenty minutes' walk from his own chapel was Dukinfield Old Chapel, their mother church; a little further off he could see the square tower of the beautiful church at Flowery Field; then he looked into Denton, where there was a growing congregation and beautiful schools, with which the name of the Rev. Lawrence Scott would be for ever associated. A little to his left he could see pointing to the sky the spire of their cathedral at Gee Cross, of which their beloved bishop, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, was minister. A small hill prevented his seeing Mottram Chapel and the new church at Glossop. At Ashton, close at hand, there was already a congregation, and there would soon be a church. On the other side, embedded among the hills two miles away, was the Mossley Chapel. Where, in England, from one spot, could such a picture be seen? Coming to themselves, he might say, they were a rather numerous body of Unitarians worshipping in one of the prettiest churches in that town, and though they were attached to their own form of faith, they had nothing but the kindest feelings for their brethren of other churches, and they lived at peace with their neighbours. They began their new year with an increase of twenty names on the church roll. They had a large and successful Sunday-school, with more than 300 scholars and teachers. For many years they had taken the leading place in the examinations, conducted by the Manchester District Sunday School Association. They had two large classes of young men and young women, and most of them were members of the church. They were a poor congregation, having no rich men or employers of labour amongst them, and when they undertook any big work they had to ask the help of surrounding friends. They were a proud people, too proud to go into debt. They never yet had a debt on their church and school, and they did not mean to have one, and should anything happen to prevent them receiving the amount required, the work would have to wait till the money came in. Sir John Brunner had a hearty reception. He said he was pleased with the account Mr. Harrison had given of themselves. If they had no rich men among them, then they might have after a few years, for Unitarians carried into their business the same fearless honesty and truthfulness which animated them in their religion, and those were qualities of which the world stood in need. Mr. John Jackson proposed, and Mr. Joseph Oliver seconded, a vote of thanks to Sir John Brunner. On the motion of Sir John Brunner a similar vote was given to the chairman, who, in his reply, delivered a kindly message from their old friend, the Rev. Joseph Freeston. Sir John, before leaving, contributed £50 to the funds. On the second day Mr. Rupert and Mrs. and Miss Potter opened the bazaar, and received a warm welcome from their old friends, the company singing "Auld Lang Syne" as they ascended the platform; Mr. Edwin Oliver presided. On the third day Mr. Charles W. Jones opened the bazaar; the Rev. H. E. Dowson presided. On Saturday Mr. James Jackson, the chapel warden, was the opener, Mr. W Wardle presiding. There were good audiences each day. At the close of the proceedings on Saturday, it was announced that the proceeds, including donations, realised £916.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The ladies of the Sewing Society have resumed their meetings preparatory for a sale of work. On Thursday, March 1, the last of the pleasant social evenings was held in the schoolroom, when a splendid programme of vocal and instrumental music was given. The company, larger than usual during the evening, moved by fervour and loyalty, stood up and sang "God Save the Queen," in honour of the relief of Ladysmith. Miss Green and Miss M. T. Walton were the hostesses for the evening.

London Permanent Chapel Building Fund.

An Appeal to Unitarians to assist in raising at least £12,000 for the support and spread of Liberal Christianity in the Metropolitan Area.

President—Sir JOHN T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P. | Chairman of Committee—W. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., LL.D.
Treasurers—FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD, Esq., and FRANK PRESTON, Esq.

(1.) A portion of the Fund, not exceeding one-third of the net amount raised, shall be devoted to paying off debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of, some of our chapels and halls in or near London. The particular congregations to receive this assistance, and the amount of the assistance to be given to each such congregation, shall be settled by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, regard being had to the efforts made by each congregation to help itself.

(2.) The remainder of the Fund, not less than two-thirds of the whole, will be formed into a Permanent Chapel Building Fund for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with OPEN TRUSTS. This Fund shall be vested in a body of twelve Trustees, who shall be nominated in the first instance by the Council of Ministers and Delegates and the Subscribers to the Special Fund. The Trustees shall have a voice in the selection of the site, and shall themselves decide what amount they will advance towards the cost of its purchase and of the erection of the building.

(3.) The sum so advanced shall be a charge on the land and building, and shall be repaid in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Trustees shall in each case deem proper. The Trustees in their discretion may remit payment of interest. The income of such portion of the Fund as is not out on loan, and the interest on any loans, shall either be paid to the Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, or added to the capital of the Fund, as the Trustees may in each case determine.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE desire to call the special attention of our readers to the letter of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, which will be found in another column, referring to the Indian Famine; also to the note appended to his letter. Many of our friends, we are aware, have already contributed to the Mansion House Fund, and some congregational collections have also been made. But such a fund as Mr. Sunderland has suggested, sent as a gift from the members of our churches in this country, would carry a direct message of sympathy to our friends in India, which would be highly prized, and would be administered by them to the best advantage in relief of the distress.

WE called attention last week to Miss Winifred Robinson's Concert, to be given at Essex Hall on Thursday, March 29, in aid of the funds of the London Unitarian Bazaar. But unfortunately in the advertisement of the Concert, which appeared in the same issue, the date of the Concert, by a printer's error, was wrongly given. We trust that none of our friends were put to any inconvenience by this mistake; they will find the advertisement this week correctly printed.

LORD SALISBURY replied last Sunday to a telegram received in the previous week from the Presidents of the South African Republic and the Orange Free State, that after what had taken place Her Majesty's Government were "not prepared to assent to the independence" of either State, and on Wednesday a telegram was received at the War Office from Bloemfontein, in which Lord Roberts announced:—"By the help of God, and by the bravery of Her Majesty's soldiers, the troops under my command have taken possession of Bloemfontein," and proceeded to refer to "Mr. Steyn, late President of the Orange Free State" and "the late Government." The coil of guilt and innocence, of misunderstanding and suspicion, of good and evil passions in this whole conflict is horribly tangled, but it is clear that the remorseless process of empire building is to proceed, and we must still wait to see what form the magnanimity of the victor is to take.

THE National Council of Evangelical Free Churches has been holding its annual meetings during the week at Sheffield, where over a thousand delegates were present. During the past year forty-four new councils have been formed in different centres in England and Wales, bringing the total to over 600. The Council is preparing for a great united mission at the beginning of the next year, to inaugurate the evangelising work of the new century. The members were entertained on Monday evening by the Lord Mayor at the Town Hall, and on Tuesday morning Dr. Mackenual, the retiring president, preached the opening sermon, which is printed in full in this week's Christian World Pulpit. It was a very earnest utterance on "The Times of the Nations," setting forth an ideal of national life, which might make one that was true to it "a sacrificial nation"—an ideal, the cherishing of which, he sadly said, had made him "a lonely man." The true seat of a nation's life, Dr. Mackennal said, is the conscience:—

The National conscience must be Christian. Distinguish between the Government and the people, and in the people between their essential, enduring life and their temporary, casual moods. Governmental action, in an ideal State, would be the exact representation of the people's inmost and permanent thought. It never has been so; it is not so to-day. Even in England, where perhaps the ideal has been most nearly approached, it is not so. . . . The nation is not Christian.

And in conclusion, picturing a nation that might dare to disarm, and trust only to the defence of the good services it could render to the world, even as the Quakers had trusted not in the use of force, which might lead to the destruction of the "sacrificial nation," and yet be a Divinely appointed lesson to the world, the sermon concluded:—

The end of the New Testament prophecy is—the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of Christ; but it is not certain that any nation now in existence will share in that consummation. We have no more reason for affirming the indefinite continuance of national life than for believing that we ourselves shall not die. In both cases the prospect of death brings with it the awe of judgment. It depends on the use any people make of the "new occasions" which "teach new duties," on their readiness to follow "Christ's bleeding feet"—"Toiling up new Calvaries ever, with the Cross that turns not back"—whether their memory shall perish in merciful oblivion, or their influence shall survive among the energies of the Kingdom of God.

AFTER Dr. Mackennal's sermon, he welcomed the new President, the Rev. C. H. Kelly, of London, on behalf of the assembly, who then delivered his address. Among the business subsequently transacted was a resolution on the subject of education, in which it was affirmed that the members of the Free Churches could not rest content:—

(a) Until either by setting up School Boards in districts of suitable area, and by the provision of Board-schools, or otherwise, there is brought within the reach of every child in the kingdom a school under the control of duly elected popular representatives in which the religious instruction shall be free from sectarian bias; and

(b) Until teachers and pupil teachers in all the State-aided schools, and students in all State-aided training colleges, shall be free from any theological test.

A resolution on the subject of the war had been contemplated, but in view of the sharp division of opinion in the Council, was abandoned. On Tuesday evening the Council sermon was preached by the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, in place of the Rev. F. W. Macdonald, President of the Wesleyan Conference, who was prevented by illness from being present.

THE Rev. F. J. Chavasse, M.A., Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, has been appointed Bishop of Liverpool, in succession to Dr. Ryle. Mr. Chavasse was ordained in 1870, and had nineteen years' experience as a parochial clergyman (ten of them in Oxford) before he succeeded Canon Girdleston at Wycliffe Hall. His appointment to the bishopric of Liverpool is welcomed by the Record as one "for which Evangelical Churchpeople will be profoundly thankful," and the Guardian, admitting that anyone but an Evangelical would be in a false position at Liverpool, adds:—

But Mr. Chavasse is not the mere exponent of a party. At Oxford he has had a spiritual influence of a most marked kind; men of various points of view have sought his counsel, and he has been able to develop the best that was in them. He has shown that he possesses the power of winning men; he will now have to govern them, and to deal not with individual persons only, but with broad public questions. If personal devotion and patient care avail for such a task as this, we do not doubt that a few years hence Mr. Chavasse's name will be honoured in Liverpool as much as it is honoured now in Oxford. If Mr. Chavasse's views are not ours, we can at least wish him a hearty Godspeed in his new office, and express our sincere belief that he will discharge its great duties in the spirit "of power and of love and of a sound mind."

An appreciative notice of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's Essex Hall Lecture on "The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity," appeared in the British Weekly of Feb. 22, in an article which we take to be from the pen of Dr. Robertson Nicoll. What is chiefly dwelt upon is the importance of a right conception of the fruition of eternal life; but the sentences we quote from the opening of the article will have a special personal interest for many of our readers:—

Mr. Wicksteed has published a most pregnant and suggestive little book, which no thoughtful student of theology should neglect. Differing as we do fundamentally from the Unitarians, we have often recognised in no grudging way their eminent contributions to religious literature. Now that Dr. Martineau has gone, they have perhaps no more accomplished and modest teacher than Mr. Wicksteed. As a literary critic he stands very high, and he handles with equal power the masterpieces of literature, old and new. . . . Mr. Wicksteed compels admiration by the moral qualities manifest in his writing, by his sincerity, his fairness, his firmness, and his constant sense of his own limitations. Through everything that he writes shines a true and most impressive spiritual faith, not indeed attaining to the profounder secrets of Christianity, yet wistfully seeking to enrich itself; never flippant, never merely destructive, never afraid of facing false popular tendencies with grave and brave rebuke.

Signor Bracciforti, of Milan, desirous of joining in the tribute of gratitude to the memory of Dr. Martineau, has recalled the presentation of copies of Channing's and Martineau's works to the Queen of Italy by Miss Durning Smith, and has sent us two of Dr. Martineau's letters. The earlier letter, in 1888, is a reply referring to that presentation; the second is as follows:—

35, Gordon-square, London, W.C.,
May 25th, 1895.

Dear Mr. Bracciforti,—Accept my warmest thanks for your gracious remembrance of me at the moment of my step into the tenth decade of my life. It is a privilege most cheering to my heart to be thus recognised by one who has shown such consistent loyalty to truth, and never shrunk from sacrifices for conscience sake. Such are the men whom I love and honour; and to be assured of their esteem and sympathy, is a blessing that makes light of all privations. If the Giver of all good has put into my heart, and brought out of it, any message which has found response among my brethren here and there, and drawn or held them nearer to Him than they would else have been, I am grateful to Him for the commission, which I have most earnestly aspired to fulfil.

Much harder has been your task, involving so large a clearance of obstructive and consolidated superstition before reaching the pure central Divine truths, which needed only development and application. In spite of some threatenings of reaction in the sacerdotal direction, I am persuaded that the old ecclesiastical creeds are paralysed, and have lost their hold of the modern European mind, and that the drift of the living piety of our coming time is towards the simple spiritual Religion of Jesus Christ, which we are endeavouring to set free from its clinging adhesions of misconception and perversion. Let us, then, bid our successors to be of good cheer, and persist in the testimony which we have not withheld, but which will soon be silenced in us.—I remain, to the end, gratefully and affectionately yours,

James Martineau.

We referred recently to the Rev. J. T. Lloyd, Presbyterian minister at Johannesburg, as an exception to the current opinion of British ministers of religion in South Africa on the subject of the war. In the British Weekly of March 8, however, we see that Mr. Lloyd has been persuaded to publish a recantation of his faith in the Boers, or, at least, in the leaders of the Transvaal Boers. Until the end of last year Mr. Lloyd, though a loyal British subject, openly avowed his strong sympathy with the Transvaal.

I felt obliged to denounce the Imperial policy, as interpreted by Mr. Chamberlain and Sir A. Milner. To me it was a policy calculated inevitably to eventuate in war. I knew the Uitlanders had genuine grievances, though the Press greatly exaggerated them; but I knew also that the bulk of Uitlanders would not have accepted Dutch burghership on any terms. In my opinion, the political agitation originated with a few rich men whose ambition was not to acquire representation or citizenship, but to bring about the overthrow of the Dutch dynasty.

But early in December Mr. Lloyd read a pamphlet by a German, published at Capetown, entitled "The Transvaal Secret Service Plot," the gist of which was "that there had been in active existence for many years an Afrikander plot to break for ever England's supremacy in South Africa, and that what I had always regarded as the capitalists' plot was, after all, only a counter plot." This allegation he was ready indignantly to deny, until Mr. Reitz, the Transvaal State Secretary, admitted to him, that although the pamphlet was written by a "mad German," and as a whole was utterly false and misleading, yet "about one-tenth of it might be true.' Soon after, he also saw a report of a conversation between Mr. T. Schreiner and Mr. Reitz, nearly twenty years ago, with regard to the motives and objects of the Bond party at that time. This confirmed his fear that there was some truth in the assertion "that the Dutch have been plotting against the supremacy of Great Britain in South Africa," and he was convinced "that it would be impossible for me to pursue any pro-Boer course whatever, and I at once utterly abandoned the idea."

It thus appears that Mr. Lloyd has lost faith in the leaders of the Dutch, though he has "still confidence in them as a people." "I believe they are a brave, heroic race capable of great things, if wisely led." Having referred previously to Mr. Lloyd, we felt bound to publish his recantation here, but it should be carefully noted what his admissions amount to. He has given no ground for disbelief in the loyalty of the Africander leaders in Cape Colony. The conversation between Mr. T. Schreiner and Mr. Reitz, which had so much weight with him, belonged to the early days of the Bond, when Dutch feeling had been intensely stirred by the rising and the retrocession of the Transvaal, but later the feeling at the Cape towards the Transvaal has greatly modified. It may be well here to quote from Mr. Bryce's Preface to the new edition of his "South Africa" (p. xl.):—

The truth would appear to be that the Transvaal people did at one time cherish the hope of extending their Republic over the wide interior. They were stopped on the west in 1884. They were stopped on the north in 1890. They were stopped in their effort to reach the sea in 1894. After that year British territory surrounded them on all sides except where they bordered the Portuguese on the north-east. Many of them, including the President, doubtless cherished the hope of some time regaining a complete independence such as that of the Free State. Some ardent spirits dreamt of a Dutch South African Republic, with Pretoria for its future capital; and there were probably a few men of the same visionary type in the Colony and the Free State who talked in the same wild way, especially after the Jameson invasion had stirred Dutch feeling to its depths. But from such dreams and such talk it is a long step to a "conspiracy of the Dutch over all of South Africa."

On the same day that the British Weekly published Mr. Lloyd's recantation, the Christian World published a letter from the Rev. S. J. Helm, of Grahamstown, denying the assertion made by the Rev. C. Phillips, of Johannesburg, that among the Free Church ministers in South Africa "there is really no dissentient voice." For himself and a brother minister in Grahamstown he avowed disapproval of the war and inability to justify it, and was of opinion that there were several ministers in other towns who agreed with them.

The Society of Friends, in Liverpool, have issued an appeal to their fellow-citizens on the subject of the war, from which the following are the concluding sentences:—

"So long as the Christian conscience is imperfectly developed, jealousy and strife must remain, and we cannot expect the great ideals of Christianity to find immediate and full expression in our national policy. But it is not for the Christian Church to set her seal of approval upon practices which exist only through the persistence in human nature of unholy passions which it is her mission to subdue. She is bound by the very nature of her responsibilities to confront the world with the teaching of her Master. The Lord's Prayer becomes an empty form if, upon every occasion of warfare, the Churches appear before the people as apologists for strife. If they are merely to register the popular conception of national righteousness, where shall we look for that influence which makes for a higher life, and which seeks to translate into reality the ideal of a common fellowship under the fatherhood of God? Were all who speak in the name of Christ, earnest and united in denouncing the worship of wealth and of force which taints our politics and swells our armaments, war would become impossible. May we, with humility, acknowledge the unfaithfulness of our stewardship, and labour more earnestly that the will of God may be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE CENTURY.

The Progress of Science and its Significance for Religion.

III.

The Duke of Argyll, in his "Reign of Law," remarks that "it seems as if all that is done in Nature as well as all that is done in art, were done by knowing how to do it." Not only has the Lord "by wisdom founded the earth," and by His knowledge of acoustics "planted the ear," but in such a piece of mechanism as the bird's wing He has bent material laws to His purpose, in a way which "Man has never been able to accomplish." Recent progress begets the hope that man may at last succeed in navigating the air; but if he does, it will be, of course, by a more complete knowledge of animal mechanics. The maxim that "knowledge is power" is especially true in the field of natural science; and accordingly the great discoveries of the century have given boundless scope to the inventor.

Here we have to do less with astronomy and geology than with physics and chemistry, less with biology and researches in caves, and more with experiments in the laboratory. Useful inventions, when they include the control of steam and electricity, affording quick travel and instantaneous communication, are among the great achievements of the century. Machines, when they do the work of a hundred pairs of hands, cheapen production and multiply comforts, enabling a larger number of persons to live refined lives, and bringing to many the leisure for learning. It may not be at first apparent that there is any religious significance in these things; but indirectly there is so much impact upon thought and theory and practice, that the churches are being profoundly affected.

While the steam-engine was in the engine-house, and stationary, the manufactured articles were less easily diffused abroad; but when George Stephenson put a locomotive on iron rails—between Liverpool and Manchester, in 1830—a grand era of quick transit was inaugurated both for goods and men. The lines now cover our land, as the network of a spider's web, and ramify everywhere like arteries carrying the blood of life. On the continent it is the same, and on the ocean as well as on land. In 1838 the Atlantic was crossed by steamers, while people at home were essaying to demonstrate that it could not be done. One result has been that Western Europe is never now visited by famine, whereas in former days the mere bad roads often kept provisions out of the cities. Another result has been the breaking down, to a large extent, of national barriers; and that in every sense. Cowper had lamented that—

> A channel interposed
> Makes enemies of nations, which had else,
> Like kindred drops, been mingled into one.

But now the sea became the great highway, and the distant places of the earth were brought near enough for easy visit. Almost at the same time came the invention and development of telegraphic communication. The dream which occurred to Bishop Wilkins, more than two hundred years ago—of "a secret and swift messenger" by which "a man may with privacy and speed communicate his thoughts to a friend at any distance"—has come true. A line of telegraph was set up on the Blackwall Railway in 1837; in 1850 Dublin was connected with London; and in a short time followed the bold enterprise of spanning the depths of the Atlantic. The lines now cover all civilised lands and ocean highways, like a complex nervous system, trembling with the energies of life. Over shorter distances the telephone conveys the actual sounds of the voice; and the man of business visiting London can converse with his clerks in Birmingham, and get the gist of his letters. Where wires cannot be laid, as between moving ships, or between a besieged city and the outside world, we are now beginning to use a wireless telegraphy, which has already brought timely aid to some. It requires some effort of thought to realise now the world of our grandfathers. But when the battle of Waterloo was fought, it was three days before the despatches reached London; and when they were printed in the newspapers, mail-coaches conveyed them over the country at the pace of seven or eight miles an hour.

Railways and ships were primarily wanted to carry merchandise—to take our manufactures abroad, and bring home in exchange raw cotton, corn, timber, and every kind of foreign produce. But the facilities for travel have also induced people to move about more than formerly; and from this disposition a variety of results are flowing of far-reaching importance. The weary and the sick are taken to health resorts, and workers are conveyed to the districts where there is employment. The tunnelling of the hills by the railway engineers is typical of the general breaking down of barriers that is proceeding, between county and county, between nation and nation. It was counted a great achievement when Brunel burrowed under the Thames, using a tool suggested by the teredo worm; but since then the Alps have been pierced and France joins hands with Italy. When nations have more to do with one another, no doubt they may sometimes quarrel in consequence, but the more permanent result is likely to be an increase of goodwill. We see this even at home; for whereas there were villages in England, at the beginning of the century, in which the inhabitants incited their dogs to attack every stranger, the disposition now is to attract as many as will come. Prejudice is produced by the provincial life; insolence is born of living in an island; but travel shows us that foreigners are men like ourselves. After we have sojourned in Paris we are less desirous of a war with France. Nor can our merchants, who trade to all the ports of the world, wish to have the commerce interrupted. No nation now is self-contained, in the sense of growing and making all the things that it needs; and therefore it is sure to suffer inconvenience when war breaks out. Increased intercourse is therefore, on the whole, making for peace and goodwill. When war does break out, we have quicker news of victory or defeat; and are thus able to take measures which prevent the struggle from dragging on for thirty years. Happily we have the same facility for sending succour to the distressed; we learn the condition of India as to plague or famine, and can send money by telegraph.

One of the modern sciences—greatly aided in its development by modern travel—is Anthropology. It has quite supplanted the older Ethnology, which was little more than a description of tribes and their customs, and is now a comparative study of race, language, custom, myth, ritual, and religion. Prichard, by a rigorous investigation, had shown that although the nations differ in form and colour and other characters, the differences are mostly superficial, and the human race might have had one origin.

The modern anthropologist can only admit the common origin by assigning to the race a vast antiquity. The facts of language, by themselves, seem to demand many thousands of years if we are to assume that there was but one tongue originally. But some curious beliefs and customs are well-nigh universal, and relate to birth and baptism, tribal initiation, marriage, death, and the world of spirits. It is recognised by anthropologists that the Hebrew people must have their place in this comparative study; and that such matters as circumcision and sacrifices, holy days and a priesthood, polygamy, purifications, scapegoats, and the purging out of leaven, have their parallels among the Gentiles. The practice of the nations in regard to marriage has been very various—communal, polygamous, polyandrous, monogamous—and the student is led to ask, which of these has been best in human experience. He learns the will of the Creator in that way, rather than by turning to any word of Scripture.

The progress of science has been so sure and so beneficent that, in Protestant countries, it is no longer actively opposed by the Church or resisted by the multitude. The Romish Church does not seem to have moved from its old ground—and will not even yet allow that Nature may be to us a source of truth—but all the Protestant churches are proud of their members who make discoveries. The people believe in astronomers because they predict eclipses so exactly; and they suffer chemists gladly because they invent useful processes. They are not disposed to quarrel with the men who refine sugar and purify drains, who furnish acids and make dyes; nor with the men who lay cables and light the streets with electricity. They are won over by the beneficence of science: and they have now also the better education, which fits them for intelligent appreciation. In 1832, on the mere announcement that a comet would cross the earth's orbit a month before the earth reached the spot, a panic ensued; and the French Government had to ask M. Arago to write an essay to allay the popular alarm. In 1800 and in 1833, showers of shooting stars affrighted the ignorant with apprehensions of the Judgment Day. In 1866, the reason of the star shower was calmly investigated; and in 1899 the expectation of it excited pleasurable curiosity. Neither the astronomer nor the chemist is any longer imagined to be meddling with forbidden things.

Among the best appreciated benefits of science must be counted the great advances in surgery, and the use of antiseptics and anæsthetics. Amputation used to be a horrible thing, and the opprobrium of surgery, but is now performed without pain and generally followed by a safe recovery. The surgeon is aided by the stethoscope, the speculum, the laryngoscope, the ophthalmoscope, ingenious instruments which enable him to read with accuracy the progress of disease; and latterly by the Röntgen rays, by means of which he can actually see through skin and flesh. In connection with these things, we may remember the testimony of Dr. John Brown in Rab, that chloroform is "one of God's greatest blessings to his suffering children." And it is just here that a change of thought may be noted. When Sir James Y. Simpson began to use chloroform, to spare women from agony and save them from death, he met with fanatical opposition and pious protest. A storm of invective arose against the new anodyne on the ground that it undermined religion. There were people who said that Nature ordained the pain, and the curse on the mother of mankind required that it should be borne. It was a great thing for women when the Queen herself had chloroform administered to her, was pleased with the effect, and made a good recovery. Sir James Simpson deserved his crest—the healing rod of Æsculapius, and his motto —Victo Dolore; and we owe to him besides a victory over theological superstition. It is but a corollary that we should destroy disease germs with carbolic acid, and drain our dwellings to escape the plague. Many years ago, when Edinburgh was visited with cholera, the clergy wanted to have a Fast-day appointed; but Lord Palmerston advised them rather to clear away the dirt. Through better sanitation our towns are now more healthy, infant mortality is lessened, and the average length of human life is increased.

When people are made comfortable they grow contented; and then their satisfied temper contributes to charity of judgment and toleration of difference. They become humaner in action, milder in controversy, and merciful even in war. The day is yet distant when wars shall cease; but scientific invention, which makes the weapons more deadly, also mitigates the sufferings of soldier and civilian, and shortens the period of the fight. A golden age is believed to be before us; not as a thousand years of triumph prophesied for the saints, but as the natural fruition of human progress and experience. We get our ideas on this subject, not from the Apocalypse but from Evolution; though some sects among us still cling to the old hope. If the Past had been a weary repetition of generations, all at the same level, with nothing new under the sun, there would be nothing to hope for; but now we see that we have been winding round a mountain which has clear atmosphere at the top. Henry Drummond's "Ascent of Man"—a book of science coming to us from the orthodox camp—indicates in evolution the working of a far-sighted beneficent Providence. It gives us the impression of a Creator who has well-defined purposes which are being surely worked out: for "who hath resisted His will?" If the process is more like one of gentle growth than anything mechanical, the wonder is not less, and the ripeness will come with the fulness of time.

It is gradually becoming recognised that the final act of the drama must be in due accordance with its commencement. A Six Days' creation, followed by a day of rest, had been made typical of the world's history—six thousand years of labour and then a millennium of rest: "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years." The Temptation and Fall, involving even the lower animals in death, and placing the very ground under a curse, brought the whole creation to groan and travail in pain, waiting for redemption. The failure of the First Adam, made necessary the sending of a Second—the Lord from Heaven. The mischief having been wrought by the Dragon: who is "that Old Serpent, the Devil and Satan"—the evil would only be ended when Michael and his angels war against the Dragon and he is cast down, and eventually thrown into the bottomless pit. But all this doctrine will have to be discarded, if the Fall is discredited or shown to be allegory. The great antiquity of man, coupled with his still undeveloped powers, gives promise of a long future for the race. And the progress in arts and in comfort, in culture and refinement, in goodwill and helpfulness, will at length, we trust, make the earth as a Kingdom of Heaven. In all the theological change forced upon us by the science of the century, we have only given up what was false; the old teaching was humbling and discouraging, and not so grand as the new. We rejoice now to know that the earth is not under a curse. Nature is not the Devil's playground, but is reclaimed for God. Man by his long ancestry becomes ennobled. The heavens are larger to our knowledge; and the Great God is magnified in our thoughts.

Geo. St. Clair.

THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS.

I.

There is a disposition in many quarters to select from among the contents of Christian faith the belief in the Fatherhood of God, and give it a position by itself, and of superior rank. Indeed, there are not wanting those who assert that the whole sum of Christian teaching is contained in the declaration of the Divine Fatherhood. The isolation of this one article of belief tends very naturally to obscure certain others of equal value, and as a result goes far to imperil the truthfulness of all. It is no uncommon thing, for example, to find an earnest insistence on the Fatherhood of God, accompanied by a more or less hesitating grasp of the significance that attaches to that great article which runs, "I believe in the Forgiveness of Sins." Where this is the case, no gain in prominence on the part of the former doctrine can compensate for the emasculation it necessarily undergoes by the suppression of the cardinal importance of the Forgiveness of Sins.

Our conception of the Fatherhood is determined by our appreciation of Forgiveness. If we isolate the Fatherhood, the order of our thought will probably be on this wise. Forgiveness will become an inference from the Fatherhood. We shall argue: God is a Father, therefore He forgives, forgives as a matter of course. It must come easily and naturally to Him by reason of His Fatherhood. In this way we empty the conception of the Fatherhood of its redeeming power. If we would preserve it, we must reverse the order of our inferences. First we must realise what forgiveness costs, the unspeakable condescension and measureless love which restore communion between God and the sinner, and then the Fatherhood resumes its richest content. We must not say, He is the Father and therefore He forgives; we must say, He is the Father because He forgives.

It follows, then, that everything centres round the primary fact of Sin. This must be so even on more general grounds. For if there be a God who enters into spiritual relations with His creatures, then the existence in man of anything that hinders or destroys these relations must be the central fact in his experience. Even if we define Religion as nothing more than that whereby man seeks God, resting the whole matter upon human effort, the biggest fact in life for the religious man must still be the possession in himself of something that obstructs his search. Moreover, in our human relationships, what fact so conditions our peace and our power for action as unity with those whom we love and who love us? Estrangement from them takes the colour from the sky and clothes the world in grey. Life creeps upon a broken wing until that union is restored. But, however this may be, we must certainly declare that for the specific matter of the Divine Fatherhood everything centres about the fact of Sin.

What, then, is Sin? No attempt is made here to give an exhaustive answer to so profound a question. What sin is in itself, as an objective fact apart from the conviction of sin, lies outside the scope of the present inquiry. And similarly with the question as to what is involved in the punishment of sin apart from its consequences in inner experience. Nothing is said here concerning the connection of physical evils with the punishment of sin, and I refrain from asking how far it is legitimate to interpret the occurrence of suffering, disease, and death, as penalties of sin. Indeed, it must be remembered that as our subject is Forgiveness, it is the remission of sin itself and not the remission of its penalties with which we have to do.

Nevertheless there is an important sense in which we have everything to do with the penalties of sin. For sin is its own penalty. The moment in which it appears in our consciousness its punishment begins; we may even say that it is the very pressure of the punishment that awakens us to the full sense of the presence of sin. We are punished by that sense of estrangement from God which is the immediate fruit of our sin. But mere estrangement, if not further defined, is inadequate as a description of what has taken place. The full effect of the estrangement is not seized until we realise what it has compelled us to think concerning God and His relations to us. It compels us to think of Him as unable to enter into communion with us; in other words, that it is impossible for Him to forgive our sin. This is the severest portion of our punishment, that we are reduced to an inability to believe in the Divine Mercy.

This inner consequence of sin is a constant element in Christian experience. When Peter in the first moment of his new-born conviction of sin cried out, "Depart from me for I am a sinful man, O Lord," it was because he saw the distance between himself and his sinless Lord, and could not conceive how across that distance communion was possible. The sense of his unworthiness obliged him to disbelieve in the possibility of forgiveness. That this is no singular phenomenon but a normal incident of Christian experience is proved by the persistence, in its successive forms, of the doctrine of the Atonement. The various theories of satisfaction, whereby it has been sought to estimate the conditions making it possible for God to forgive, do but reflect under changing intellectual conditions that unchanging experience of the soul, wherein it is made powerless by the oppression of its sin to conceive the freedom of the Divine Mercy.

We find, then, that sin most signally discovers its presence in us by the compulsion it puts upon us to lose our certainty of the love of God. This is the greatest of its penalties. It would seem to follow, therefore, that we are forgiven when we recover that certainty, that the recovery of certainty is our forgiveness. It is this which makes the forgiveness of sins so determining a factor in the religious life, and provoked Luther to declare that "where there is forgiveness of sins, there is life and salvation." The certainty of God's love, when brought to the soul, which labours beneath the intolerable burden of inability to conceive the existence of that love, is the recovering of sight to the blind and the resurrection of the dead. But it must be added that where forgiveness is conceived as anything less than the restoration of this lost certainty, as anything other than "a great deliverance from a great distress," it loses its significance, and none is moved to confess that the fruit of it is life and salvation.

I have said that the restoration of this certainty of the Divine Love is the forgiveness of sins. I do not assert that this is the whole content of forgiveness, but that there is no forgiveness without it. It follows that we do not require to distinguish between forgiveness and the assurance of forgiveness. If we have no assurance of forgiveness we are not yet forgiven. No man is pardoned who has not realised his pardon. Furthermore, we can conceive no forgiveness where there is no repentance. We are impenitent as long as we feel it no burden to be compelled by our sin to disbelieve in the Divine Love, as long as we are without the sense of our separation from it. The burden cannot be removed until it is felt as a burden. Wherefore it must be said that forgiveness cannot begin without the desire for it and cannot come to completion without the assurance of it.

We have next to ask by what means this assurance is conveyed. It is evident from what has been said that before assurance can be complete a great impediment has to be overcome. This impediment is the sinner's conviction that forgiveness is impossible, or, to define it more expressly, that it is impossible for him who has transgressed against holiness to enter into communion with the Holy One. In short, what is required is to convince him that the impossible has become possible. Nothing less than this is involved in the conveyance of the assurance of the forgiveness of sins. By what means is a task of this magnitude to be accomplished? Clearly something as extraordinary in its character as the obstacle to be removed is extraordinary. It cannot be done by words, by persuasiveness of speech, by argumentation. It cannot be done by the mere proclamation that God forgives sins, that He is a Father, since it is precisely these statements that the sinner cannot credit, and we do but mock him in his malady by the vain repetition of a truth which he is too sick to make his own. "The Parable of the Prodigal Son on a sheet of paper" will not do it. No mere telling helps at all, it must be seen that it may be believed.

One thing, and one thing only, will prevail, and that is the actual spectacle in history of that very communion of Holiness with Sin which is thought impossible. What in the hour of our estrangement from God we believed could never happen has happened. On this very earth we tread Holiness has entered into communion with Sin, a Holy One has made himself the companion of sinners, has come seeking them and finding them, has lived and died for their sakes. The impossible has taken place. Christ has revealed what holiness is, the righteousness of God becomes to us a reality in him. But in him the mercy of God also becomes a reality to us, inasmuch as we see conjoined with holiness a love of sinners availing unto death and triumphing over death. This it is that rids us of our hesitation to believe that the Divine Mercy can co-exist with the Divine Righteousness, and so, as St. Paul said, "Christ Jesus was made unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." It is the living fact of Christ's appearance in the realm of sin that conveys to us the assurance of the forgiveness of sins.

It is not, however, the historical person that by itself does this for us; the whole range of effects that have issued from him play their part in the work. No fact is more certain than that those in whom our Lord has most nearly lived again are the people who have possessed at once the deepest sense of the gravity of sin and the intensest love and pity for the sinner. Their Christianity has flowered in nothing so royally as in their passion to redeem the dead in trespasses and sins. In them, though in fainter outline, the original spectacle is repeated, and again and again in the lives of the choicest spirits of Christendom we have seen Holiness and Love go hand in hand down the via dolorosa in search of the lost. We may say, therefore, that it is all these things, together with the source whence they flow, regarded as a totality, that convey to us the assurance of the forgiveness of sins.

If I am asked, cannot this be effected apart from Christ, I can only answer that the question sounds in my ear like an inquiry concerning "the might have been," and into that ghostly region I decline to penetrate. I can only speak of what has been and what is. The Spirit of Christ has been working in his Church for nineteen hundred years, and for all on whom its impress has been laid nothing can remain as if he had not been. All things become new; Sin itself and the sense of it become new. There was the sense of sin, of course, before Christ came, but after he was come it became transformed, it entered on a new birth. There is a profound sense in which we may say that Christ creates the sense of sin, certainly re-creates it. His is the hand that deepens the wound he comes to heal. In one act he spreads our self-esteem in ruins and lifts up our hearts. He is at once our humiliation and the staff of our confidence. Our peace is broken at his touch, and yet the root of its security is in him. There is no paradox so complete as Christian faith in the Forgiveness of Sins.

Ambrose Bennett.

[While commending Mr. Bennett's article to the earnest consideration of our readers, we confess to being still of those who hold that the declaration of the Divine Fatherhood, when truly made, does contain "the whole sum of Christian teaching." But this by no means involves the isolation of that doctrine from the rest or any light regard of the significance of sin; it is simply an acknowledgment that the Fatherhood of God is the supreme truth, which gives their full meaning to all other aspects of religious truth.

The result of sin, Mr. Bennett truly says, is that we are cut off from Divine communion, but it does not follow that we must therefore disbelieve in the Divine Love and in the possibility of forgiveness. Mr. Bennett, in one sentence, couples together "disbelief in the Divine Love" and "the sense of our separation from it." But surely the burdened sense of separation from Divine Love implies not disbelief but belief in it, as the supreme good; and what is needed is that the sinner should not be left alone with his sin, to despair of the possibility of restoration. From this he is saved, when he is made aware that it is not a relentless Judge, but the heavenly Father against whom he has sinned. The parable of the Prodigal Son "on a sheet of paper" may not bring him that deliverance; but the parable in the heart of Jesus, or in the heart of any true and loving friend, may do so. While he is impenitent he cannot be forgiven, but when with honest penitence he longs to return to his Father's house, ready to bear the penalties he has brought upon himself, if only he may be received again within the circle of the home love, then he is made aware of what forgiveness means.

There is no communion of Holiness with Sin. But Holiness, which cannot really be separated from Love, seeks the sinner to save him from his sin. That is what we see in Jesus, who thereby shows to us the mind of the Father; and that is what we see, in a humbler measure, in every good home, where father and mother, loving goodness, love their children in spite of all wrong-doing, and will suffer to the utmost for their sake, to bring them to the true life of faithfulness and love.—Ed. Inq.]

THE UNITARIAN MOVEMENT IN THE KHASI HILLS.

The winter conference of the Khasi Unitarians was held at Nongtalang on Dec. 30 and 31, 1899, and Jan. 1, 1900. It was a very inspiring gathering, marked with closer fellowship and wider sympathies. The conference was opened with a welcome meeting in the church on Saturday evening.

On Sunday there was a devotional service in the morning, two sermon meetings during the daytime, and a singing procession in the afternoon. The preachers were Mr. U. Mársingh, U. Khro Shyrmang of Jowai, the Rev. David Edwards, and the writer. The discourses dwelt chiefly on the need of more devoted and earnest missionary efforts on the part of every individual Unitarian who should consider himself as a missionary in the place in which he lives.

In the evening there was a meeting of the Board of the Union, in which the accounts were read. The amount of receipts was Rs. 77. The opening balance of the year was Rs. 75, making a total of Rs. 152; of this Rs. 88 were contributed to the Mission Fund. In addition to this the sum of Rs. 97 was received from friends for the Nongtalang Church Building Fund.

It was observed that our Union is still in its infancy, and it was the duty of those more advanced among us to work hard in their respective churches to enlighten our people.

The following places were represented:—Jowai Church, U. Khro Shyrmang; Raliang Church, Rev. David Edwards; Laitlyngkot, Mrs. Ka Pari; Shillong, U. Kumbit Kongor; Mulang, U. Sah.

It was decided that the church rules should always be adapted to the progress of the people, since they were framed for promoting their interests. Cases have been found in which the people have outgrown the rules; in such cases new rules should be framed to suit them.

On Monday morning there was a business meeting, in which the doings of the Board were read. The following resolutions, among others, were passed:—

1. To send greetings and our sense of gratitude to the Unitarians of Great Britain and America, and to the Rev. S. F. Williams, Unitarian Missionary to India.

2. To send greetings and our sense of deep gratitude to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, and to express to him our earnest desire to see him once more in our hills.

3. To send greetings to the Rev. Nilmani Chakravarti, of the Brahmo Somaj, and also to all the Brahmos of India.

It was resolved that papers on the following subjects would be read at the forthcoming anniversary of the Union, to be held at Jowai, in April, 1900:—(1) "Organisation: its Benefits"; (2) "Why should I go to Church?"

At the close of the meeting collections were taken from friends of other places, in aid of the Nongtalang Church Building Fund, and Rs. 9 were realised. The Unitarians of Nongtalang were busy collecting materials for their new church, which they hoped to complete during this year.

JOHN WITHERS DOWSON.

The centenary of the birth of John Withers Dowson, of Norwich, was celebrated, on the evening of Feb. 28, by a simple and touching service of commemoration at the Octagon Chapel, conducted by his nephew, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. It is twenty-one years since Mr. Dowson's death, but his memory is still gratefully and reverently cherished in many hearts, and the younger generation are reminded of him by his portrait, presented to him on his seventieth birthday by old Octagon scholars, which hangs in the schoolroom at Calvert-street. His wife, who was an Enfield, is no less gratefully to be remembered, as of like spirit, and one who by the quiet influence of a beautiful life ministered richly of the grace of Jesus Christ.

An article in the Eastern Daily Press spoke of Mr. Dowson as follows:—

Educated at Norwich Grammar School under Dr. Valpy, young Dowson, after serving his articles to a London firm of solicitors, came to Norwich and established a practice, but his name soon became prominent as a leader in all educational movements. He never spared himself in advancing the intellectual and moral aspirations of those about him. By six o'clock on a winter's morning he was leading the studies of a group of lads before their hours of shop or office work began, and on a summer's day he thought nothing of escorting a band of youths on a gay trudge to Cromer, botanising by the way, and this when a septuagenarian. Many still alive owe their prosperity in life to his happy faculty for setting young men on the right path and building up healthy tastes and sturdy principles of rectitude and perseverance. So early as 1823 he was secretary to the Norwich Mechanics' Institute, where he established and fostered a debating class, in which men who afterwards became prominent obtained their first practice in public speaking. As a Guardian and charity trustee he was a good administrator, but his chief claim to the admiration and recognition of his successors is his work as an educationalist, and naturally he was elected to the first Norwich School Board.

In his address at the memorial service, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson said that they were met together there, in a place rendered sacred by many associations and memories, to hold communion with the spirit of a good man who, if ever man did, worshipped there in spirit and in truth. Speaking of the influence of Mr. Dowson's life he said:—

"As for myself I am full of memories which have been among the holiest and most inspiring of my life. I go back to my earliest days of consciousness, and among the figures that rise up before my childish recollection the chief place is taken by my uncle Withers and my aunt Maria, the familiar names by which in our Yarmouth homes we children knew Mr. and Mrs. Withers Dowson. From that day to their deaths they were nearest and dearest to us of those beyond the immediate home circle. In all my first thoughts of what religion was those two stand out as its embodiment. As we grew a little older one other face, closely united with these two in a friendship of kindred souls, used to shine upon us—the most beautiful and heavenly I ever saw—the face of Travers Madge. There are few here who knew Travers in his bright, beautiful youth when he first came to live with my uncle and aunt. In my boyhood he was the ideal of a Christian without guile. These impressions were deepened when it fell to my lot to live for two years at the old house on Castle Meadow. I there lived while attending a school in which my uncle and Travers were teachers. There were no boys in that school who did not learn in it much more than classics and mathematics. The spirit that pervaded the place was worth more than all the lessons. From half-past six to eight my uncle was teaching lads who came to morning classes opened by him freely in various subjects. Those classes were the making of a number of young men. There they were touched with new ambitions to raise themselves and do good in the world, and their after lives have borne witness that his labour for them was not in vain. It was an inspiration in Christian endeavour to live with such a man and see his work."

He then read a letter from the Rev. W. Blazeby, also an old pupil of Mr. Dowson's, expressive of heartfelt gratitude and reverence, and with the aspiration that they might all "follow in the footsteps of this beloved and exalted friend and exemplar, and hereafter join with him again in 'the Church of the First-born above.'" Having recalled many pleasant memories of his younger days, Mr. Dowson's address concluded:—

"A true Christian man, a soul of transparent sincerity, a genuine labourer in every work that tended to purify and elevate the mind, a man of unshaken and unshakeable faith—all that was John Withers Dowson."

OBITUARY.

MRS. J. LETTIS SHORT.

It is with great regret that we record the death of Mrs. Short, widow of the late Rev. J. Lettis Short, for many years minister of the congregations at Bridport and Sheffield. She was daughter of the late Mr. Samuel Wright, of Mickleover, near Derby, and was married to Mr. Short in 1847, whilst he occupied the pulpit of the General Baptist Chapel at Dover.

Throughout her life she was earnestly attached to the chosen labour of her husband, whose efforts she aided heartily and lovingly, winning the respect and affection of his people.

When loss of health compelled Mr. Short to resign the Sheffield pulpit, he retired to the city of Bath, where Mrs. Short continued to reside after his death.

But the devotion to congregational work which had marked her earlier years did not fail. Until comparatively recently, when she was obliged to winter at Cannes, she retained her district of the Provident Society, and visited its members weekly.

Fearless in thought and word, Mrs. Short constantly maintained her interest in the work of our churches, and, indeed, in the progress of all that was uplifting and good.

For some years her strength had shown signs of failure, but her friends hoped that the warmer climate of Southern France would again restore her power. She was never to return, however, to the land she loved. Her death took place peacefully at Cannes on March 9. She leaves one daughter to mourn her loss.

HENRY JOHN COOK.

Liverpool is the poorer by the loss of one who for fifty-five years has been one of its righteous citizens, who fell gently asleep on his eighty-first birthday, the 7th of this month.

Commencing in Byrom-street, in 1845, Mr. Cook built up the extensive business identified with his name, remaining faithful to the same locality, only enlarging and beautifying the outer edifice as need arose. He was known as a just and considerate employer, and an upright man of business.

As a magistrate he gave steadfast and conscientious attention to public duty, being also usefully connected with various philanthropic institutions. Religiously, he became a member of Paradise-street Chapel, under the ministry of the Rev. James Martineau as he then was, following him to Hope-street Church, in the erection of which he took deep interest, and remaining a member of the congregation to the end, though unable for some years past to attend its worship. He was also interested in the Bootle Free Church, being one of the earliest donors to its building fund, and attending the morning service a few times while yet able.

Mr. Cook was a deeply cultured man, reading all the best books, and always abreast of the world of thought. The charm of his conversation was great, seasoned as it was by reminiscence and reflection, and sweetened by a quietness and gentleness of tone, and a charity of disposition, which rested the hearer.

One of his last utterances was "I have had a very happy life," and truly he confirmed the saying, "The path of the righteous is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

WILLIAM DUPLOCK.

The congregation of Westgate Chapel, Lewes, has sustained an irreparable loss in the calling away of the late Mr. William Duplock. He was a tried and life-long friend, an able and experienced official, and a warm and enthusiastic worshipper. After a period of gradually failing health, he passed away on Saturday morning, Feb. 24, at the advanced age of nearly eighty years. He had been prominent for many years in all the work of the town, at one time holding the chief office of High Constable, before incorporation days. For forty years he was a member of the Board of Guardians, and many years was its chairman. The esteem of his fellow-citizens was proved by their attendance at his funeral, which took place on Wednesday, 28th ult., and which was conducted by the minister, the Rev. T. A. Gorton. On the following Sunday a memorial service was held in the chapel, where Mr. Duplock had been a constant attender all his life, and in younger days Sunday-school superintendent for twenty-five years. Of a staunch Nonconformist stock, he was a man of sterling worth, of whom in his loyalty to the cause of freedom and of religious worship it might be truly said, "The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up."

BERNARD DAWSON.

We regret to record the death on March 3, at The Laurels, Malvern Link, of Bernard, only son of the late George Dawson, of Birmingham. As a civil and mechanical engineer he made his name widely and honourably known in the profession, while his untiring energy and high sense of duty impressed the stamp of remarkable thoroughness on his work. The same qualities, combined with a very genial and sympathetic nature, made him ever ready to help others; busy as he was professionally, he spared neither time nor trouble in giving assistance, and brightened many a person's life by his acts of thoughtful kindness. With liberal opinions of his own, he inherited his father's strong aversion to the sectarian spirit, and also to insincerity in all its forms. Incessant hard work and overstrain gradually undermined his health, and after more than a year of serious illness and much suffering, he died at the early age of forty-nine.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Are there any children—readers of this column—who do not think that courage is a grand quality? Which of us would not choose to be brave rather than cowardly? When you read of the deeds of heroes and heroines, do you not long to be as fearless and noble as they were? Here is a story about courage, but before we begin to read it, I want to say that I think there are two kinds of courage in this world, and that children do not always remember this, and do not always distinguish between them. There is a sort of bold daring, such as lions and tigers possess, by which people can face perils, and fight enemies when their blood is hot. With this sort of courage the thought of right and wrong has nothing to do. A gladiator in a bull fight has this sort of courage. But there is another kind which we call moral courage. Moral courage makes us ready to go into danger, to bear pain bravely and to run any risk for the sake of doing what is right, for the sake of defending the weak and ill-used. This courage springs from a sense of duty. Those who have moral courage set their minds bravely on doing what is right; they are not bold just for the sake of getting their own way, or of showing how strong and valiant they are.

Now for the story, which may help to show what I mean. In a large day-school a boy named Robert Picton had become the leader of his school-fellows. He was a strong burly fellow who won in the races and the games, was always ready to fight, and thought himself a hero when he knocked down a boy who had offended him. This sort of spirit had spread through the school, and the other boys longed to be as brave and as fine a fellow as they held Robert Picton to be.

One day a new boy, Harry Wellman, came to the school. It was soon found that he could run races and play games as well as Robert could. The younger lads liked him because he was good-natured, and did not ill-use them, and it looked as though Robert would have to give up his place as leader of the school to this new-comer.

Now it was noticed that Harry Wellman never fought, and it was whispered about by one boy to another, as a matter of great surprise, that Harry was never seen to get into a passion and lose his self-command. Robert who was jealous, and looked upon the new-comer as his enemy, resolved to prove to the school that Harry was a coward. He went up to him in the play-ground one day, knocked him roughly, and growled out between his teeth, "Here you sneak, it is time for us to have it out! Fight me if you dare!" The other boys, who were scattered about the ground, stopped their play, and rushed up to the place. One told another what had happened, and there was a great shout of "Fight him, Harry! Fight him!"

Harry's blood boiled; his face flushed; he longed to knock Robert down and begin the fight, which he doubtless could win; but he knew it was wrong and kept his hands tightly clenched. There was a minute's silence, and then broke out the cry of "Coward!" As Harry turned away the crowd gathered round their old leader shouting "hurrah" with all their might. After this Harry was shunned by his companions. No one would play with him. If he tried to join in the races he found himself left standing alone. Sometimes his old followers came to him and urged him to declare himself willing to fight Robert, but when they saw that he would not they also left him alone, and some of them even muttered "coward" in his hearing, as he passed by. Which of those two boys, do you think, was most like a hero?

Now hear the end of the story. In the country town in which the school stood, a fire broke out one night. The engine rattled down the street and a terror-stricken crowd of people gathered together and watched how the flames were spreading rapidly from house to house, though the firemen were all at work as hard as they could pouring water on the burning buildings.

It happened that as Robert Picton and Harry Wellman stood near together, a woman, almost frantic with grief, came hurrying up to Robert, who looked so strong and bold, and, pointing to one of the upper windows, besought him to save her child. Robert turned away. His courage was not equal to that task. Harry sprang forward, rushed through the smoke which almost hid the doorway and the stairs, and disappeared from sight. News of what had taken place spread quickly through the crowd. A great hush fell on the excited people, and as the moments passed while they stood eagerly watching the house in which the baby lay, they began to lose all hope that either it or the brave youth who was trying to save it would ever be seen again.

Suddenly, out through the blinding smoke, soaked with water from the firemen's hose and blackened from head to foot, came Harry. Hastily he put the baby into its mother's arms and disappeared in the crowd; but not before some one had recognised him. You will believe that next day the school boys who had scorned Harry as coward knew him for a hero. Perhaps they began to see that it required really more courage, and courage of a better kind, for Harry to force himself to do what he thought right though he was laughed at and despised, than it would have done to fight Robert with the knowledge that, if he won, he would be once more the leader of the school.

Do you not think it is true that there is a grand kind of courage and also a poor imitation of it? The real heroes and the happiest people are those who keep in mind the thought of what is right for them to do, and then do it at all costs. It is moral courage that will make us all—men, women, and children—brave enough to fear no danger and trouble to ourselves while we are doing our duty; that will make us strong always to speak the truth; to put a stop to what is wrong and stand firmly resolved to help on what is good and true.

So it is moral courage that is at the root of all fine character, and if we want to be like true heroes—God's heroes—when we are men and women, we must try, while we are boys and girls, to cultivate that grand kind of courage; not the bold daring that will gain for us our own way or prove how strong we are in body, but the courage that will help us to do every day just what we know to be right, however hard the task may be.

THE FREE UTTERANCE OF OPINION.

Sir,—Mr. Moy Evans's suggestion that those of us who signed the memorial to Lord Salisbury yielded to a "temptation to take sides with the minority" seems a very unworthy aspersion on men, some of whom, at least, he ought to hold in honour. May I tell him that to some of us—probably to all—this finding ourselves in a minority on such a question of England's Imperial conduct is a pain that bites and stings every day and every hour? The "temptation" is continuous to be silent and to smile with the crowd.

For the rest, I trust and am convinced that you will not be deterred from uttering your own convictions on all matters that touch the national conscience, or from giving audience to responsible correspondents on either side. You are not placed in the Editorial chair to trim your sails to the breeze of popular opinion, whether Unitarian or any other, but to maintain an honourable tradition by setting an example of clear, modest, and courageous utterance of what your understanding and your conscience hold true. Neither do you speak for any but yourself, nor do we memorialists speak for any but ourselves severally and individually. The suggestion by Mr. Evans that we seek to represent the views of the religious body of which we are members, is gratuitous and untrue.

At the present moment a greater evil, if possible, than even the war itself overshadows us as a people. Far and wide the endeavour is being made, and too successfully, to suppress the utterance of opinion. So far as that succeeds, we lose the most sacred heritage of Englishmen. Thank God! here and there we still find a journal, if not a platform, where unpopular opinion may have its say. If the rights of the free Press and the free platform be finally crushed, farewell to the liberties of Englishmen.

THE UNITARIANS HAVE NOT PRONOUNCED AGAINST THE WAR.

Sir,—My friend, Mr. Hargrove, amazes me. I have read and re-read the first sentences of his letter in the hope that I had not taken his meaning. But no, the implication is clear. He seems to regard it as one of the triumphs of his memorial that I who have not signed it should be involved in whatever blame may attach to those who have. That, sir, is the reason I, and others, protest so warmly against it. I submit that one's brother ministers, instead of being glad, should be most reluctant to take any step which should seem to involve those who disagree with them. That is what has happened, as Mr. Hargrove himself bears witness in his opening sentence. This memorial, with its long list of ministerial names, has been widely received as representing the general attitude of our body towards the war. "So the Unitarians have pronounced against the war" was one of the remarks heard at a club the other day. As a fact, the Unitarians have done nothing of the kind. The memorial represents the opinion of not one-half of our ministers, and, since no layman has signed it, it does not represent lay opinion at all. I appeal to Mr. Hargrove, as a lover of justice, to tell us plainly whether he is glad or sorry that more of us who disagree with him should appear before the world as the accomplices of his views and that, in consequence of action taken by him and others, the impression of our complicity should have gone forth into quarters which our disclaimers cannot reach. It is, alas! but too true. How many readers of the memorial in the newspapers or elsewhere know the proportion which the long list of names there appearing bears to the total number on the ministerial roll? Nine persons out of ten jump to the conclusion that we are practically all in it! Should not the foreknowledge of this false impression have been regarded by the memorialists as a grave objection to the publication of their memorial and not, as Mr. Hargrove's first sentence implies, a point to be emphasised in its favour? The way in which the others have thus been involved is, I believe, identical with the process known in party intrigue as "dishing" your opponents. Surely it must have been unforeseen! Surely not one of the bearers of these honourable names could endure to think of himself as the party to such an act! Let them, therefore, make us amends and not twit us, as Mr. Hargrove has done, with being in the same box with themselves.

Sir, if this memorial were as well calculated to promote peace in South Africa as it is to stir up strife within our own borders I could look upon it with a more complacent mind. During the past week many letters have reached me, both from laymen and ministers, proposing that we should get up a counter memorial to Lord Salisbury. I have no doubt it could be done; indeed, it is temptingly easy, but the temptation is one to which it behoves us to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan; thou savourest not the things that be of God." Such action would merely accentuate a note of strife, the silencing of which will, I trust, be regarded by the original memorialists as the next in order of their public duties.

L. P. Jacks.

Birmingham, March 13.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir,—I have a great respect for many of the ministers who have signed the requisition to Lord Salisbury, and have no doubt they are actuated by conscientious motives; but I expect a large number of the signatories have little knowledge of the state of affairs in the Transvaal previous to the war, and only signed because they were asked to do so by brother ministers in whom they had confidence. Have the authors of the memorial really considered what would be the result if the overtures for peace were to come from our side? Have the Canadians, the Australians and other Colonies, as well as the Volunteers and Yeomanry, given their money and risked their lives merely that matters should continue as they were before the war began? No, the overtures must come from the Boers; they forced the war upon us, especially the Orange Free Staters with whom we had no quarrel, and must take the consequences.

The settlement now must be effectual to prevent a recurrence of war, and this can only be done by disarming them and putting them under British rule.

Joseph T. Preston.

Finchley, March 13.

Sir,—No one, I think, will accuse you of unfair treatment in favouring one side; but many agree with me that The Inquirer is not the proper medium for discussing party politics. This point, that the war is just or unjust, you deny to be "party politics;" but the majority will surely be against you, as they will also differ from your opinion that the ministers' memorial was perfectly clear as being issued without reference to their congregations. The majority of people (outside Unitarianism) think otherwise, and I submit justifiably so. No one denies them the right of free speeeh, as you submit, but we ask that they make it clear to all that they do speak simply for themselves.

You are not aware that ministers have interfered with political opinions. Turn to your own columns, to the utterances of John Page Hopps, and of the ministers at the recent London and South Eastern Provincial Assembly Meeting. I certainly do not deny "even to these gentlemen the right of forming and expressing their political opinions," at the right time and place—which is not at a religious gathering, nor in the pages of The Inquirer.

You say "The Inquirer may for a time have to bear the hostility or the cold neglect of some old friends." That, sir, is not the point at all. If it begun and ended there, our remedy would be easy and clear. You seem to be altogether blind to the fact that those who come and join you from other Churches already suffer much for their, shall I say, "rashness" in so doing—looked at askance by former friends, in part socially ostracised, suffering in business and income alike (unless already sufficiently strong and wealthy to be heedless of such matters). Pointing to our friends the able theological articles in The Inquirer, we are all of a sudden pulled up by its rampant party radicalism, and this compromising (to us) memorial of the ministers, so that if these things are to be considered as part and parcel of what "Unitarian" stands for, there will be nothing for it but for us who vainly protest, not to drop The Inquirer, but to sever once for all our connection with that body, who misled us by their misstatements that they had no creed or confession of faith. The author of the unpublished long letter,

Hugh James.

Wandsworth Common, March 13.

Sir,—Perhaps, after all, it would have been better if The Inquirer had closed its columns against any reference to South Africa. For one thing, it is hardly fair to poor ministers to give them facilities for increasing their troubles and reducing their salaries. Of course, it is quite true that a Christian minister is, by his very vocation, a follower of Christ, "the Prince of Peace," and a teacher of his loving Gospel; but if, instead of contenting himself with saying that prettily in sermons and in poetry on Sunday, he tries to apply it in actual life and to a case in point on Monday, without "consulting the congregation," let him look to it. His freedom is not as perfect as he imagines, and there are penalties.

One man thinks that the war we have provoked is only the climax of our marauding and harrying for nearly a century; another man thinks that we have been forbearing friends. One talks of the commission of England's greatest crime (and in that agrees with the civilised world); another talks of the discharge of England's God-given task. One points to the slaughter of innumerable Republicans, and says, "Look at these men and boys who were defending their hard-won and beloved country against truculent robbers"; another pronounces a blessing on Imperialists who are God's ministering servants. All this is very puzzling. But the greatest puzzle of all is—that it is the Christian minister who is true to his calling, and who speaks up for Christ and his teachings, who is punished, and that if he dares to meet his friends to plead for peace, he finds that the people who applaud the "fighting for freedom" in Africa, are as ready to stone him or crucify him as their spiritual ancestors were to stone or crucify another friend of peace 1900 years ago. It is, indeed, "a mad world, my masters!"

Among the further letters we have received on this subject, we have to acknowledge with sincere thanks several of cordial encouragement, both from those who agree with the views we have expressed, and from those who differ.

Mr. N. M. Tayler, of Hampton-on-Thames, writes:—

"I have not come to your conclusion about the Transvaal War. I think it is right on the part of the British Nation, and I am not aware of any sufficient reason for it on the part of the Transvaal and Free State peoples. My impression is that the men at the head of their Governments have very much deluded them in several respects. Nevertheless, I thank you for discussing the matter and allowing it to be discussed. It is quite as much a part of religion for a nation to be righteous as for individuals; the former necessarily follows from the latter."

The Rev. D. J. Williams, of Merthyr Tydfil, writes questioning the very positive assertion of Mr. Moy Evans last week as to "the majority of Unitarians," but adding that even though we should prove to be in a minority it is our duty fearlessly to speak out.

THE INDIAN FAMINE.

Sir,—In common with many others, I am deeply stirred by the sad condition of things in India. The famine is already very terrible, and is daily growing worse. It is now practically certain that the suffering is to be more severe and widespread than three years ago. The facts that come to us through the most reliable sources are simply appalling. An area of 450,000 square miles, containing a population of 60,000,000 people, affected! Some regions stricken that never suffered before! More than 4,000,000 persons already receiving relief!—which means that unless the relief is continued they must all perish. And the tide of distress rapidly rising! If there ever was a time when the civilised world, but especially the people of England, ought to be roused to pity and generous help, surely such a time is now.

At the time of the famine, three years ago, public sympathy was deeply moved, and a large sum of money was raised. Not nearly so much as was needed; and yet enough so that a vast amount of suffering was prevented, and several millions of lives were saved. But the need is greater now than then. Hence the amount of relief-money raised in England this year ought to be larger. But, alas! will it be? A Mansion House Fund has been started. But as yet it amounts to a mere pittance compared with the demand. The tragedy of the situation lies in the fact that this call from India comes at a time when the sympathies and the generosity of England are flowing in another direction—that of relieving the suffering caused by the war. Thus the far greater distress in India is crowded out of public thought. This puts all the greater responsibility upon those of us who know the facts. It seems to me to be the duty of every Christian man, and every lover of his kind, to call public attention to this more vast and more terrible Indian suffering, and to see to it that no other appeal, however worthy, shall make the nation forgetful of this.

I write especially to ask, Would it not be well for our liberal churches to take the matter up, and make a special united effort to do what we can? I know that in London we have on hand our great Bazaar, an important matter, with which I am in heartiest sympathy. But this need not dull our ears to the cry of India in her distress. Other denominations around us are moving. One of the smallest, the Friends, I see have already raised a fund of some £2,500, which its missionaries are administering. Three years ago the English Unitarian churches raised a famine fund and sent it on for our Brahmo Somaj brethren to administer. It was not large, but it was something. We all know how gratefully it was received, and how much good it did. Of course, if we prefer, we may merely let things take their own course, leaving such of our people and our churches as see fit to give, to do so through the general channel of the Mansion House Fund, as a few have already done. But this means that we shall not do nearly so much, either as individuals or as churches, to meet the great need, as if we take up the matter together and make a definite and united effort.

It is well to remember, too, that the money raised by our churches, three years ago, accomplished a double good; it not only did its full work in feeding the starving, but it also gave much encouragement and moral support to our Brahmo brethren; it brought them and us a little nearer together, and it helped the people of India to see that English Unitarian sympathy is a thing of deeds. It will, of course, be the same again if we now take up the matter and raise another fund and send it over to be administered under the supervision of the Brahmo Somajes and Mr. Williams.

Readers may be interested to know that I have laid this suggestion of a special appeal to our churches informally before the Indian Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and while no official action has been taken, as none was asked for, the idea of such a general appeal has the Committee's hearty sympathy.

I do not wish to put stress upon any particular form or plan of procedure. The main thing is to arouse our churches and our people to do all in their power to alleviate the terrible suffering caused by the famine. If it is best to do it through the channel of the Mansion House Fund very well. But at least shall we not try to stir up every individual Unitarian and every liberal church in these islands (yes, and every Sunday-school—for it would be of immense moral value to all our children to enlist them in such a work), to do something, and as much as possible through some channel. I simply suggest the plan of raising what we are able by a united effort, and in our own name, and letting it be administered by agencies in India selected by ourselves, because I believe that such a course will produce the best results.

Highgate. J. T. Sunderland.

[We are requested to state that the funds administered by the Indian Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are not available for relief purposes, but that the Chairman of that Committee, Mr. Ion Pritchard, will be glad to receive donations to a special fund, which will be forwarded to our friends of the Brahmo Somaj, in Calcutta, to be administered by them in relief of the appalling sufferings caused by the famine. All donations, which should be sent to Mr. Pritchard at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C., will be acknowledged in these columns.—Ed. Inq.]

THE LEICESTER CONFERENCE.

Sir,—With reference to travelling facilities for persons attending the Conference at Leicester, I have to state that the railway companies have for the first time consented to issue return tickets at the cost of a single fare and a quarter, available from April 2 to 7 inclusive, to all ministers, delegates and visitors who may present a form of certificate at the booking-office. These forms will be posted early in the ensuing week to those who have favoured me with their names and addresses, and, on the receipt of a stamped addressed envelope, I shall be glad to send a copy to any other friend who proposes to be present.

THE LONDON BAZAAR.

Sir,—I shall be much obliged if you will allow me to ask your readers to lend me any specimens of Old English needlework they may have been careful enough, and affectionate enough, to preserve. I have undertaken to form a Loan Collection of Samplers and other Early Needlework, to benefit the funds of the Bazaar, the whole to be exhibited in an off-room from the main hall, with separate admission money; I am wishful to make it a high success; and if fellow-Unitarians all over the country will be so good as to entrust me with any treasures they may have of the sort, I know there will be no chance of failure. I have written to many private friends, who have generously responded, not only by loans of their own, but by asking other private friends for theirs; but there is a larger public still, equally generous I am sure, if I can only get them to know what it is I desire. My present promises extend from flowered bed-hangings belonging to Oliver Cromwell, to the finest and tiniest disc of cambric, embroidered with the owner's name and carried in a watch-case. The Samplers proper date, as yet, as far back as 1769.

To enable me to prepare a descriptive catalogue (in which lenders' names will appear), I would esteem it a great favour if loans can be sent to me here on or before Tuesday, April 3.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION OF PRESBYTERIAN, UNITARIAN, AND OTHER NON-SUBSCRIBING CHURCHES.

The annual meetings were held at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Monday, the 12th inst., and throughout the day were well attended. The proceedings were opened by the singing of a hymn, and prayer offered by the Rev. James C. Street. The minutes of the previous annual meeting being taken as read, the secretary read the Committee's report.

It presented three points of particular interest, having reference to Stratford-on-Avon, Wolverhampton, and the financial position. At Stratford-on-Avon at the strong desire of the people a minister has been appointed, with the acquiescence and help of the Union and the B. and F.U.A. Under the leadership of the Rev. E. B. Betham, things promise extremely well for this earnest and vigorous congregation. For Wolverhampton there is a scheme on foot which is much more nearly commensurate with the presumed possibilities of that town than any hitherto tried. With the proceeds of the sale of the old property the trustees have bought a plot of land in a favourable residential suburb; and on it have set up the iron schoolroom. A remaining sum of £175 they have agreed to devote to the erection of an iron church, the Union promising to devote a sum up to £250 for the same purpose. Then, in conjunction with the B. and F.U.A., it is hoped to provide a salary of £200 a year for a minister. Given the right man, under the new conditions, there is good reason to anticipate that liberal religion will at length be adequately represented in this important centre. Lastly, the financial situation is anything but cheerful. The detailed figures were presented in the treasurer's report, which was read immediately after the Committee's. The excess of ordinary expenditure over ordinary income for the year is £171 1s. 7d. In spite of that the balance-sheet reveals a balance of £398 18s. 5d. to the credit of the Union. That is due to the fact that the legacy of Mr. Charles Cochrane—i.e., capital—has been utilised for current requirements. That is altogether unsatisfactory, and a process which cannot be continued long, especially as £250 of the £470 so received is ear-marked for Wolverhampton. The great need is for new and increased subscriptions, to the obtaining of which a determined effort is to be made. One gentleman has promised to raise his subscription to £10 on condition that nine others will do the same; three others will increase theirs to £5 if seventeen more will join them. The report further chronicled the alteration in the name of the Union by the introduction of the words "Presbyterian and Unitarian" in the title; and paid a tribute to the memory of the late Rev. H. Hill, of Banbury.

The President, in moving the adoption of the reports, announced that it was his wish to retire from the office, not from any lack of interest, but because, having held it for four years, he considered it would be advantageous to the Union, and especially if a layman could be found to succeed him. At the express wish of the Committee, however, in view of the crisis in the Union's fortunes, he agreed to be nominated for another year, and was, of course, gladly elected. In the conversation which followed, the Rev. James C. Street suggested the formation of a Twentieth Century Fund of £10,000, to be devoted to the strengthening of existing churches and to forward movements. As might have been expected the suggestion was received with many smiles and some cheers on account of its audacity, for Midland Unitaria has persuaded itself that it is miserably poor. Some, however, dare to hope that a seed has fallen into soil that will prove unexpectedly rich. The two succeeding resolutions respectively thanked the officers and Committee for their services during the past, and elected them for the ensuing year. Then the President moved from the Chair a recommendation from the Committee:—

That this Union, while incorporating the words "Presbyterian and Unitarian" with its official title, disclaims any intention whatever of urging the adoption of either of these names upon the churches of the Union, or of limiting the benefits of the Union to churches thus designated.

He explained that it was submitted on the ground of fears which some persons entertained that the change which had been made might indicate the beginning of a sectarianising process, fears which he himself by no means shared.

The Rev. J. Wood, in seconding the motion, said that one of the largest subscribers to the Union was a Congregationalist.

Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee thought the matter, having been settled in September, it would be better not to pass this injudicious rider, which seemed to him to take away with one hand what they had given with the other.

The Rev. J. C. Street said the resolution would do no harm, and would give satisfaction to those who did not wish to see a sectarian name associated with the title of the Union.

Mr. H. New thought the resolution unnecessary.

The President said that he considered the resolution logically unnecessary, but the world outside only knew that they had changed their name, and might think they were going to change their policy. Therefore he thought the resolution allowable as a disclaimer of any change of policy.

Mr. Vickery (Shrewsbury) did not see how the resolution was to have that effect unless it were added to the already long title of the Union.

The motion was passed by a considerable majority.

The ministers and delegates were entertained to luncheon by the Old Meeting Congregation at the Great Western Hotel. The total number present, including some friends, was ninety-one. The Rev. Joseph Wood, who presided, proposed "The Queen." In doing so he referred to the admiration and love which her people have for her; and spoke of her foregone holiday that she might remain in their midst in the hour of trouble, and show her sympathy with her wounded soldiers. Whatever views, he said, they might hold as to the righteousness of the war, they all rejoiced in the demonstrations which had been made of loyalty to the Throne during the last few months. The toast was drunk with enthusiasm, and the National Anthem sung. "The Visitors" was next proposed, and responded to by the Revs. J. T. Sunderland, M.A., and John Byles. The Rev. L. P. Jacks expressed the thanks of the guests for the hospitality of the Old Meeting friends, and Mr. T. K. Scruton, the senior warden, replied.

The afternoon Conference was preceded by a short devotional service, and then the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, M.A., delivered an address on "The Place of Enthusiasm in Life and in Religion." It was rather a fine sermon than a paper opening the way to a discussion, and the President voiced the general feeling when he said that it would have been most fitting to sing another hymn, join in prayer and separate. Mr. Sunderland pointed out the supreme importance of enthusiasm in life, of which it is the motive power for all that is best, to which it gives joy and beauty. He flung aside the blighting ideal of the indifferentist and cynic, declaring that the soul lives on admiration, and though it may lead to fanaticism, enthusiasm is more likely to mark a large than a small mind. To the pitiable conception of the function of criticism that it is rightly engaged in picking holes and finding fault, he opposed the true, that it should be appreciative, help us to understand the beauty and power of the thoughts enshrined in literature and art, hold up high ideals, and make the best ideal prevail. To awaken enthusiasm is to give new meaning to the soul, in the lowest as well as the supreme occupations of life. To realise the ideal we must idealise the real. There are few extraordinary things to be done in this world; but many common things may be made extraordinary by being glorified.

Turning to religion, Mr. Sunderland showed how enthusiasm had marked the beginnings of Christianity, the Crusades, the Reformation; how in modern times it characterised the work of Wesley and of Moody, the Foreign Missionary enterprise of the orthodox bodies, and the Ritualist movement. Passing thence he combated the hypothesis that it is only to be found in connection with crude and low forms of religion, and that religion as it becomes intelligent and reasonable loses its hold on the heart. Man can be as earnest over the best things as over the second best. The religion of light and love is capable of commanding as deep an enthusiasm as the religion of darkness. True, it may be less wide, less ungoverned, less liable to run into fanaticism, but it will be as deep and unfailing as the living spirit of God. In a period of change and transition, as the present is, time may be necessary in order to adjust it to man's new environment. But already it is to be seen in Art, Science, Philanthropy, where it is not the product in any sense of superstition, but of the inherent value of the immanent ideas. Not less will that prove to be the case in religion; indeed, the signs of it are showing. It is the great need of the Free Churches, which are the issue of a movement whose progress through the long past is marked by tears and blood. Mr. Sunderland closed with a many-sided appeal to his audience to value and cultivate this Divine fire, this inward presence of the living God.

Several points of interest were suggested in the ensuing discussion, but as they are all secondary in the minds of the hearers, and have perhaps passed away, leaving the more clear the impression of the address, they need not be detailed.

About 200 persons sat down to and thoroughly enjoyed the ample tea provided in the schoolroom by the Old Meeting congregation.

The day's proceedings ended with an impressive public service in the church. It is always inspiring to worship in this noble building, especially when the service is worthy of it. The Rev. Joseph Wood conducted the devotional part, and the Rev. John Byles preached from the text, "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17), on the signs which mark its coming.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

THE annual meeting of this Society was held on Tuesday week at Leigh. In the afternoon service was conducted by the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth.

At the business meeting Mr. W. Taylor Jones, of Whitefield, was elected president, Mr. Thomas Harwood, of Bolton, Chairman of Committee, the Rev. J. J. Wright, vice-chairman, Mr. Frank Eckersley, treasurer, and the Revs. R. T. Herford and J. Harrison, secretaries.

The meeting expressed its sense of the loss sustained through the death of Mr. T. H. Hope, of Atherton; and also by the death of the Rev. G. Ride, of Chorley, and cordially welcomed into the district the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth. The thanks of the meeting were given to the Leigh congregation for their hospitable reception.

The report stated that the Mission existed to promote the cause of pure and simple religion by establishing and maintaining centres of worship and work where no barriers of dogma should prevent fellowship in the service of God and man. It was founded forty years ago, and on these lines it had been worked ever since with an amount of success chiefly conditioned by its financial resources. Within recent years the receipt of several large legacies altered considerably the financial position. The effect of this increase was twofold. It had enabled the Mission to carry out a policy of substantial help on a scale not previously possible. On the other hand, it had created the impression that the Mission was very rich and did not need support. Accordingly the receipts from annual collections and subscriptions fell off, and the amount so obtained last year was less than one-third of the whole income, and not one-fifth of the whole expenditure. It was to this point that the Committee invited the serious attention of the friends and supporters of the Mission. The policy which had been adopted at Horwich and Leigh had been very costly, as the Committee fully expected it would be. But they did not regret it, nor thought that the capital funds of the Mission had been wasted. On the contrary, the Committee pointed to the admirable work which had been done at Horwich and Leigh under improved conditions as a proof that the policy adopted was sound and wise. Annual grants had been made to five other congregations, the latest addition being that of Chesham. To meet claims amounting last year to nearly £700, it has been necessary to draw largely on capital, with the obvious result of diminishing the interest on the investments, and thus forestalling the income of future years. The Committee were by no means disposed to shirk their responsibility in the matter. They had invited each of the assisted congregations to make some special effort to raise an independence fund. In every instance this suggestion had been taken up. They asked the self-supporting churches to increase the amount of their annual contribution.

The TREASURER'S statement, including a balance due from the previous year of £161 3s. 11d., showed an expenditure of £880 17s. 3d.; receipts from collections £112 18s. 9d., and from annual subscriptions £56 14s. 0d. From investments £234 10s. 0d. had been received, and £287 15s. 4d. had been taken from capital. A balance of £188 7s. 5d. remained due to the treasurer.

In the evening a public meeting was held, the chair being taken by Mr. J. W. BARLOW, and addresses were given by the Rev. C. PEACH, representing the Manchester District Association, the Rev. C. C. COE, Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, representing the Liverpool District Missionary Association, and the Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN, the minister at Leigh.

LEWIN'S MEAD DOMESTIC MISSION, BRISTOL.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers to this Institution was held on Monday evening, March 12, in the new Mission Hall, Lower Montague-street, under the presidency of Mr. PHILIP JOHN WORSLEY J.P.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD read the Committee's report.

The Report stated that the year had been a most eventful one in regard to the experiences of the mission. The mission had sustained a loss through the resignation of their missionary, the Rev. J. Wain, who had so successfully filled the office for ten years. A resolution of appreciation of his work had been passed, and the Rev. A. Lancaster, minister of the Old Road Congregation at Middleton, near Manchester, had been appointed his successor. They were indebted to the courtesy of the Middleton congregation for setting Mr. Lancaster free, so that he was able to enter on his duties at the mission on the first Sunday in the New Year, the Sunday following Mr. Wain's farewell Sunday evening service to his old friends in Bristol. For Mr. Lancaster the Committee felt confident they might bespeak the heartiest welcome from all the workers at the mission and from those within its influence. The sanctity and the necessity of the work remained unaltered, while they indulged the strong hope that the work would be carried successfully forward in the time to come, as it had in the past. The Committee recorded their conviction that in all its agencies the work of the Mission went satisfactorily forward, though in the process there must needs be observable the ebb and flow of effort. It was not to the same friends that they could for ever look for personal or material help, for the subscription list significantly told them how friends had been passing away from them during the year. The treasurer's account showed an adverse balance of about £16, although the year commenced with the sum of £22 in his favour. Such was accounted for by the wholly exceptional deficiency in the amount of the last annual collections, by the expenditure of about £25 for the necessary repainting of the new buildings—now in good repair—and by the considerable decrease in the list of subscribers and donors through the deaths of old and valued friends.

MR. J. KENRICK CHAMPION, hon. treasurer, read the detailed financial statement.

The Rev. A. LANCASTER read the missionary's report. The Rev. J. Wain had written a report, and this Mr. Lancaster read, also adding a few words of his own. In his report Mr. Wain referred to his work during the year, and offered suggestions for the aid of his successor. He also thanked all those friends who had given him any aid in his work in Bristol. Mr. Lancaster expressed his sincere gratitude for the hearty reception given him and his wife. At the conclusion of his report, he spoke of the great usefulness of domestic missions, and remarked that the work they did at Lewin's Mead Mission was but a drop in the ocean, yet without such drops the ocean would never be filled. They continued in the work in hope and confidence, asking only for the unstinted support of friends of the mission, both old and new, being confident that this and steadfast purpose would receive Heaven's blessing.

The Chairman, in the course of a short address, remarked that it was barely three months since they last met there, and since then there had been a great revolution in the affairs of the mission. On that occasion they met to say farewell to Mr. Wain, and now the time for their annual meeting had arrived. It was a happier thing to be wishing well to an in-coming missionary than to an out-going one. He remembered five generations of missionaries there, and he hoped Mr. Lancaster's spell might last his lifetime. They could not help but remember that the life of a missionary was a very arduous one, and they could not expect a missionary to devote more than a certain number of the years of his life to such arduous work. Mr. Wain was with them ten years, and he hoped Mr. Lancaster would be with them for a good spell, and that at the end of his work there they would have to feel even more indebted to him than to Mr. Wain. He then moved, and the Rev. Dr. Warschauer seconded, the adoption of the reports and accounts, which were duly passed.

Resolutions were also passed, thanking the Rev. Dr. Warschauer and the Rev. A. Lancaster for preaching the annual sermons in aid of the Institution on Sunday, formally welcoming Mr. Lancaster, and appointing the Committee for the year.

A cordial vote of thanks to the Chairman closed a very pleasant and hopeful meeting.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE.

It has always been the misfortune of West Riding Unitarianism, that one of our most important and influential congregations, one which ought to be a centre of light and leading, is altogether out of the centre, being situated on the southern border of the county, and belonging as much to the North Midland District as it does to Yorkshire. I am afraid, to move Sheffield is beyond the power even of faith; otherwise, and supposing myself to have the faith, I would plant Upper Chapel, and the city which belongs to it, somewhere about Selby; so our Yorkshire Society would be after the fashion of an ellipse, all within converging to the two centres, and receiving from them help and sympathy in return for confidence and support. It is certainly far from being the case now, and the reason is not simply a geographical one. When Mill-hill celebrated its Jubilee awhile ago, all Yorkshire ministers were invited, but few or none were present. I do trust it may be otherwise when Upper Chapel has its celebration in the autumn, and that we shall feel that the cause is common to us all. Our congregations are independent of each other, the poorest, as long as it is self-supporting, wholly independent of its wealthiest neighbour—I pity the man who dare dispute it — but we are one body, with a common history, common principles and a general agreement in doctrine: we are forced together, too, by pressure from outside, being all of us alike under the ban of the Trinitarian churches, and suffering under suspicion of soul-destroying heresies. It is the sorest pity that we are not more united among ourselves, that each congregation is absorbed in its own concerns, indifferent to the doings of others, and jealous of an interest which might be taken for patronage. What a good thing it would be for us if the Bicentenary of Upper Chapel were made use of for a demonstration of the real unity of our Yorkshire churches, and the opportunity taken to show how thoroughly we sympathise with this old Presbyterian congregation when it meets to thank God for the graces and mercies of two hundred years of its story.

I must beware of writing anything which might read as if I had the right to either praise or criticise the very independent folk of this great town, which was the capital of Hallamshire when Leeds was probably best known as "a village in the neighbourhood of Kirkstall Abbey"; but I may venture to say that so far as I know by report there is no more thriving congregation in our body. With a minister who manages to do the work of two men without neglecting anything of his duties as pastor or tutor, a minister's wife whose name is known in our churches for her energy and intelligence, and a people who proved their resources and their good will by the grand reception given to the last Triennial Conference—with all these there is no need for outside approval, even if it were to come from one more competent than myself to bestow it.

Of the Upperthorpe Chapel I may speak more freely, as one may praise the daughter while only venturing to pay due respect to the mother. This congregation was founded in 1859, and was dependent for long time on Upper Chapel. With a courage which sets a much needed example to other places—for it is frequently the case that congregations are very jealous of independence all the while that they receive and reckon on financial support from outside—this congregation has freed itself of subordination to the mother church, and during last year received but £23 in subscriptions from members of the Upper Chapel friendly to the cause. It is a pleasure to read the balance-sheet for last year, for it gives proof both of economical management and self-denying effort. A single item one would like to see different, and, without finding fault with anyone, may I venture to say that "the labourer is worthy of his hire," and his hire should be in proportion to the services rendered, and it will be good economy on the part of the congregation to make sure of keeping so good a man as Mr. Ellis. I should say this remark is made entirely on my own initiative. If it is impertinent, I beg pardon in advance of Mr. Ellis and his people.

It is under consideration to build class rooms and vestry on vacant ground adjoining the chapel. It seems that "all are convinced of the necessity" of the alteration and addition contemplated; but such schemes must perforce be set aside when the income-tax is at a shilling in the pound. Many things, even more necessary, must await the time when war and rumours of war shall have passed away, and the impoverishing effects of even successful warfare have come to an end.

Among other institutions of this church is a "Young People's Religious Union," which holds weekly meetings, and "a religious service conducted by the members themselves." It is hoped that this will help the members "to prepare themselves by serious thought on great themes for religious work and useful citizenship." I need write no more of this, as Mr. Ellis is to read a paper on the subject at the approaching Conference.

To come nearer home. It has always been my policy, when once a minister was settled in a place to do my best to support him. Whatever might be my own judgment of the selection made by the congregation, I entertained some hopes, which I expressed in these columns, that a new era had dawned at Dewsbury, and that the church there would be both independent and thriving. But the promise of spring withered in the bud, and before autumn we were all compelled to acknowledge that "the last things are worse than the first." It is not for me to apportion the blame, certainly it was not all on one side. But whosesoever the fault, the consequence is the same. In all the vicissitudes of the last twenty years—and Dewsbury in twenty years has made far more matter for Unitarian history than Mill-hill in two hundred and twenty—things have never, I think, been so low as just now.

Well, we must expect such disappointments. St. Paul had to meet with the like, and the Union Committee is not as deserving of success as the Apostles were. At present the Committee have complete charge of the chapel, and are supplying it from Sunday to Sunday, nor is there any likelihood of the appointment of a minister till the situation undergoes a change.

Holbeck, too, is without a minister, through no fault of its own. The loss of Mr. Mathers, a life-long member and generous supporter of the church, followed by the departure of Mr. McDowell for Boston (U.S.A.), was a grievous blow. But when the right man is found—he must be a good worker in church and school, with broad sympathies and intellectual tastes—when such a one is found, the difficulties will soon be at an end.

At Bradford they are now meeting for worship at the new Channing Hall, while the chapel is undergoing much-needed repairs and decoration. We shall look forward to re-opening services which will give a seal to the good work which Mr Jones and his congregation have been carrying out at so great an expense both of work and money.

But the best news we have to give from Yorkshire is that of the settlement of Mr. Rawlings at the metropolitan city. We went over to his welcome on New Year's Day, and were cheered by the fervour of the proceedings and the sight of so many bonny young people about the place. We all hope that minister and people may soon be formally reunited with the Union from which they have been so long separated.

Scarborough is losing Mr. Thomas to the great regret of many of the congregation, to whom (I quote from a young man's letter just received) "he endeared himself as a personal friend, as well as by his pulpit utterances." For his sake I do not regret the change, but it will be difficult to find a successor. Indeed, in my experience of our churches, there has never been such a dearth of capable men to take charge of our congregations, great and small. I am glad to see that Mr. A. H. Worthington, the able and energetic lay secretary of Manchester College, is about to read a paper on "The Future Supply of our Ministers," at the Leicester

Conference, and no more important subject can be brought before us.

Charles Hargrove.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—The annual reunion of the members of the Christian Unitarian Church was held on Monday evening, in the Trades Council Buildings. Over 600 persons were present. Mr. Cruickshank presided, and was supported by the Rev. Alexander Webster, Rev. A. Brown, Dr. Mitchell, Mr. John Keir, and others. The Chairmen expressed their pleasure at the presence of Mr. Brown, a minister of another church in the city, and said that as to their own affairs, the financial condition was healthy, but they suffered from the unsatisfactory state of their church buildings. The Rev. A. Brown said that he knew himself what it was to suffer for unpopular opinions. He believed in the liberalising of theology, and welcomed as a fellow-labourer every man who wanted to change the current of Scotch opinion and make it larger, more humane, and more divine than it was. He and subsequent speakers paid a high tribute to the work Mr. Webster had done as chairman of the School Board ; and Mr. Webster, in his speech, acknowledged the very cordial relations that subsisted between himself and the members of the Board, two of whom were present at the meeting. He then presented a writing desk and purse of sovereigns to Mr. Spiby, in recognition of his services as treasurer of the church, and Mr. Spiby responded.

Ainsworth.—Special sermons were preached on Sunday, March 4, by the Rev. M. R. Scott, and anthems were sung by the choir. Collections were made on behalf of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, amounting to £8 0s. 4d., which is greatly in excess of previous collections. A subscription list has also been opened. On Thursday, March 8, the Rev. M. R. Scott gave a lecture in the Walshaw Wesleyan Mission Chapel, on "Robert Burns," being invited by the members of the Mutual Improvement Society in connection with the Mission. There was a good audience, who listened with great attention and very evident interest.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The third annual sermons were preached by the Rev. T. Bowen Evans, M.A., of Heywood, in the Mechanics' Institute last Sunday. The collections realised £13.

Belfast Domestic Mission.—A report of the annual meeting of this Mission we must hold over until next week.

Boston.—The trustees of the Spain-lane Chapel held a meeting on Sunday morning last. Miss Hill and Miss Taggart (representing the Postal Mission) and Mr. Bryan, of Nottingham (representing the North Midland Unitarian Association), were also present. It was decided to continue the services in the chapel for another three months, with the hope that in the meantime a permanent minister might be appointed. In the evening Mr. W. L. Schroeder, B.A., senior student of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, preached to a good congregation, about eighty persons being present. His address was much appreciated. After the service a few friends adjourned to the schoolroom to hear a few words of encouragement from the delegates, and also to witness a pleasant surprise, in the shape of a presentation of an enlarged framed photo of Miss Bontoft to that lady. The presentation was made by Miss Taggart, on behalf of Miss Sharpe, in a few well-chosen words. It was also decided by our younger friends to form a society to be called "The Unitarian Circle," and thus ended a very pleasant and, we hope, profitable day.

Croft.—A very pleasant social meeting was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday evening, 6th inst., when the members of the congregation met to do honour to the organist, Miss Monks, who, after twenty years of service, in consequence of her marriage, had removed to Leigh. After tea the Rev. W. Mason, on behalf of the congregation, gave a hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Ridyard, and wished them many years of happiness. He then presented to Mrs. Ridyard (late Miss Monks) a beautiful tea service, consisting of teapot (with inscription), sugar basin, and cream jug.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The first annual meeting since the settlement of the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas was held last Saturday week. Mr. Robertson occupied the chair ; and the report and financial statement were presented by Messrs. Howarth and Robinson. The total receipts from all resources during the year amounted to about £370, and the balance-sheet showed a small sum in treasurer's hands—an extraordinary feature in the history of the church. The attendance at the Sunday services has been good during the year, and since last October week-night religious services have been held regularly. These services are conducted by the members of the church, and have been fairly successful.

Newton Abbot.—On Sunday week the Rev. F. T. Reed preached in the Public Room, and gave an able vindication of the right of Unitarians to be accounted Christians. The sermon was fully reported in the East and South Devon Advertiser.

Swansea.—A dramatic performance, given by Mrs. Cleeves and friends, took place in the schoolroom on Monday evening. There were about 200 present, the room proving too small for the occasion. A substantial sum was realised towards the Bazaar Fund. As seen in the advertising columns, the bazaar will be held on Wednesday and Thursday, April 18 and 19. The Rev. W. Tudor Jones delivered two lectures during the month, one on "Instinct," at the Royal Institution of South Wales, Swansea, and the other on "How the Mind Grows," at the Town's Free Library, under the auspices of the Corporation of Swansea.

Yarmouth.—A meeting was held in the schoolroom of the Old Meeting, on Thursday week, to welcome the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., the newly-appointed minister. After tea Mr. W. Kett presided, and a contingent of friends from Norwich and Ipswich added to the success of the meeting. The Rev. E. M. Daplyn, who was unable to be present, sent a letter of encouragement. Mr. I. M. Wade, of Norwich, in moving a vote of hearty welcome to Mr. Badland, said he was exceedingly glad that there was now a chance for the revival of Unitarianism at Yarmouth. It showed by that meeting that they were not always to be at ebb tide, though they had appeared lately as if in danger of being left high and dry on a sandy beach. He had known Mr. Badland from the time he was a student in London, and had respected him as long as he had known him. If the congregation did not improve under his care the fault would be theirs, not his. They stood alone in the town to teach and preach what they believed to be the truest form of Christianity. They searched the Scriptures, but did not find the Trinity there nor in Nature nor in Reason, and they altogether failed to understand the Athanasian creed. They had a message to deliver based on the Gospel of Christ, let them firmly hold the fort and stand to their guns, and just according to their zeal and faithfulness to their principles would their day of strength be. They founded their faith on Scripture, Nature, and Reason—these three united must bring them somewhere near the truth. The resolution was seconded by Mr. G. T. Brown, and cordially adopted. Mr. A. M. Stevens, of Norwich, on behalf of the Octagon congregation, then extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Badland into the district. The Rev. C. D. Badland, in acknowledging the welcome accorded to him, said they stood for freedom, using the best name they could get. He concurred in the hope expressed that his stay in Yarmouth might be of long duration, and that he might do the best work he could. With reference to pulpit opinions, he hoped he would never abuse the privileges of what had been called the coward's castle, but it was only a coward's castle when cowardly use was made of it. As to the work in the town, he claimed the right to exercise his privileges and duties as a man and citizen. If the people did not come into their church they must go outside its walls and endeavour to persuade them to come in. Last Sunday Mr. Badland began a course of evening lectures on "The Theological Changes of the Last Century."

York.—The annual meeting of the St. Saviourgate congregation was held on Sunday, March 4, after evening service ; Mr. E. F. Lewin presided, and the Rev. Henry Rawlings was also present. The committee's report was of more than usual interest, and contained a summary of the decision in the recent Chancery case. Mr. J. W. Beal was again appointed secretary, and Mr. William Johnson treasurer, and the new managing body has been so arranged as to include some of those who were formerly of the opposition.

HEADMISTRESS—MISS ELEANOR MOSS, B.A. Hons.

A limited number of Boarders taken at residence of Principal.

The College, which is opposite the residence, has accommodation for 120 pupils. Lawn tennis, gymnasium, asphalte playground.

The Curriculum is based on the Cambridge Examination regulations, and resident pupils have the advantage of Public School life combined with home comforts.

Application to Secretary, Miss S. AWDRY.

HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

PRINCIPALS—Miss J. F. GRUNER (Certif. Student of Girton College), Moorcroft, Hindhead, Surrey.
Miss MACRAE MOIR (Cambridge Higher Local), Lingholt, Hindhead, Surrey.

The aim of the School is to combine the advantages of a good Boarding School with a thorough Education and healthy outdoor life. Girls may be prepared for College-entrance and other examinations.

The district of Hindhead is one of the healthiest parts of England, and much recommended by doctors for its bracing air and gravel soil.

Miss MOIR receives ten boarders in a thoroughly well-built modern house, with southern aspect. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. References allowed to parents of present and past pupils.

Terms for Board and Education on application to the Principals.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, CHESHIRE.

(Barker Foundation),

TO BE OPENED SEPTEMBER, 1900.

HEAD MASTER—GUY LEWIS, M.A., late scholar of Pembroke College, Oxford.

This School will provide a sound liberal education on Public School lines.

Subjects.—Religious Knowledge, Classics, Modern Languages, History and Geography, English Language and Literature, Mathematics, Natural Science.

There will be daily morning prayer and a religious service in the school on Sunday. Instruction will be given in the history of the growth of religious and rational theological thought and opinion in England, and generally in religious subjects. The boys will be encouraged in sobriety, intelligence, earnestness, and piety, and in modes and by teachers free from the obligations of prescribed creeds or tests of religious belief.

Careful and individual attention will be given to the physical training and development of the boys.

Fees.

For Boarders ... £33 6s. 8d. a term (inclusive).
For Day Boys ... £12 12s. a term.

Foundation Exhibitions (entitling to admission at half fees) are offered for Boys whose parent or guardian is a minister or member of or in full sympathy with some congregation in England statedly assembling for the public worship of God and imposing no obligation upon any member thereof (whether minister, member, or otherwise), to subscribe or assent to any articles or article of religious belief or to submit to any test of religious doctrine.

TAKE CARE

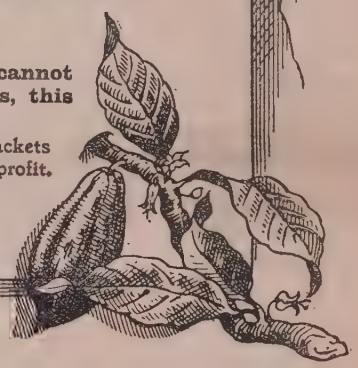
when drinking Cocoa to have the pure article only, as many so-called "Pure" Cocoas contain added matter that is not only unnecessary, but often positively harmful.

CADBURY'S COCOA

ABSOLUTELY PURE, therefore BEST.

REFRESHING—NOURISHING—INVIGORATING.

The LANCET (May 27th, 1899) says:



"The statement that Cadbury's Cocoa is an absolutely pure article cannot be controverted in view of the results of analysis which, in our hands, this excellent article of food has yielded."

When asking for Cocoa, insist on having CADBURY'S—sold only in Packets and Tins—as other Cocoas are sometimes substituted for the sake of extra profit.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE appeal published in last week's INQUIRER for donations to a special Indian Famine Fund, to be administered by our friends of the Brahmo Somaj, has met with an immediate and very gratifying response. Miss J. Durning Smith's characteristically generous gift of £500 at once insures that the fund will be abundantly helpful, and we are thankful to know, as may be seen from the list of donations appended to Mr. Ion Pritchard's letter in another column, that £600 can be at once sent out to Calcutta. Our friends will not, however, conclude from this that further donations are not required. The famine is so widespread and so dreadful in its results, that it is impossible for us to give too much towards its relief.

THE Rev. S. Fletcher Williams early in the year paid a second visit to Madras, extending over seven weeks, during which he preached every Sunday evening to large congregations in the Brahmo Upasana Mandir, delivered four weekly lectures on Shakespeare in the Museum Theatre, placed at his disposal by the Government, and gave other lectures and addresses, including a lecture on "Dr. Martineau's Religious Philosophy." To the Hindu of Madras Mr. Williams contributed an article on "God Manifest in Man," and his various lectures and addresses have been well reported in the papers, the lectures on Shakespeare appearing in extenso in the Madras Standard. At the conclusion of the visit Mr. Williams proceeded to Calicut, for the purpose of visiting various Brahmo centres, and the West Coast Spectator, of Feb. 18, speaks enthusiastically of the impression he has made, of "the steady yet thrilling stream of his oratory," of his lofty thought, "combined with the profound earnestness of a godly man." On Wednesday, Feb. 14, the Theists of Calicut presented an address of welcome to Mr. Williams, containing warm expressions of gratitude to the B. and F.U.A. for their work in the distribution of literature throughout India, and through the personal services of their representative. The address concluded as follows :—

Truth is neither of the East nor of the West, and in you and your fellow-Unitarians in the West we recognise a force that is binding East and West together by the golden thread of a Universal Truth that underlies all creeds and all religions. Our own efforts towards bringing out that Truth are feeble and our difficulties are many ; and occasions such as the present, when we can sit at the feet of a good and learned man and hear words of wisdom and comfort, are therefore peculiarly cheering.

Once more offering you our tribute of affection and gratitude and praying that the Wise Ordainer of the Universe will grant you a long and pleasant sojourn in this land,

We remain, Reverend and Dear Sir, Your humble brethren in God, Members of the Calicut Theistic Association.

REFERRING to the silence of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches on the subject of the war, Dr. Guinness Rogers writes in the Independent :—

Perhaps even this "wisest and sanest" body was not the best qualified to pronounce upon the merits of the political questions which the war involved. The exact measure of blame, for example, which is to be attached to Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Cecil Rhodes, and Sir Alfred Milner on the one hand, and to the two Presidents and Dr. Leyds on the other, could hardly have been made a subject of profitable discussion in a Free Church assembly. But on the other hand that assembly might with great advantage have spoken counsels of moderation, urged on both parties the duty of mutual tolerance, and done something to remind the world of those higher considerations which are so apt to be forgotten in the din of controversy and the clash of arms. Dr. Mackennal did this in his opening sermon, which certainly is one of the most admirable utterances which has been given on the subject. It is the calm expression of a devout man who feels how abhorrent every incident of the war is to his Christian conscience and his Christian sympathy. He does not undertake the defence of the Boers, nor does he proclaim his adherence to Tolstoi's version of Christianity, still less does he idealise the Boers and become their apologist, but he puts before us the high ideal of national policy which Christianity would suggest. It is certainly better to have deliverances of this kind than to have Christian ministers making strong contradictory statements and each severely criticising the other. Moral influence of this kind is all that even a Free Church Council could have been expected to exert.

WHILE the National Council made no pronouncement on the burning question, a memorial to Lord Salisbury was privately offered for signature, on the distinct understanding that the Council was in no way committed to it. The memorial was as follows :—

To the Most Noble the Marquis of Salisbury, K.G.—We, the undersigned ministers and delegates attending the meetings of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches at Sheffield, respectfully urge that, in view of the results of recent military operations in South Africa and of the fact that British territory is now practically freed from Boer invasion, the time has arrived when Her Majesty's Government may honourably announce the terms of settlement which they intend to demand. And your memorialists earnestly submit that such terms, while safeguarding the rights of the Outlander inhabitants of the Transvaal, should not be destructive of the independence of the two Republics.

Signatures were invited by the Rev. Dr. Clifford, Rev. Silas K. Hocking, Rev. J. Hirst Hollowell, Rev. Dr. W. J. Townsend, Mr. John Mather, and Mr. Alfred T. Davies. It was afterwards announced by the President that the name of the Council had been withdrawn from the memorial, and those who signed would be described merely as ministers and members of various Nonconformist Churches.

BOOK TABLE AT THE LEICESTER CONFERENCE.—The British and Foreign Unitarian Association and Sunday School Association have made arrangements for a supply of their more recent Publications to be on sale at the Temperance Hall, London-road, where most of the meetings are to be held. The Book Stall at the Sheffield Conference in 1897 proved to be of considerable interest to country friends, as well as successful from a business point of view. The Stall will be, as before, under the charge of Mr. Hare, of Essex Hall.

AFTER all, what is speculation to practice? What does God require of us, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with Him? The longer I live this seems to me more important, and all other questions less so. If we can but live the simple right life,

"Do the work that's nearest,
Though it's dull at whiles :
Helping, when we meet them,
Lame dogs over stiles."

—C. Kingsley.

"CROMWELL'S STATUE."

England, newly, richly gifted,
With unwonted gladness glow!
Let thy heart, enlarged, uplifted,
In exulting song o'erflow!
Triumph now, as re-enthronèd
Towers thy mightiest man of might—
As thy hero, long disownèd
Gloriously regains each right.
Not alone thy loftiest lover
Hath thy heart's true love won back:
That true love thou dost not cover;
Voice and sign it doth not lack.
List! how loudly it is spoken!
Look! how proudly it is shown!
Doth not this majestic token
Tell how grandly it hath grown?
Triumph, as this statue standeth
Right amidst thy Holy Ground,
Where thy memory most commandeth,
Where thy glories most abound;
Where is best set forth thy story,
Where most grandly speaks thy Past,
Where repose thy sons of glory,
Whence he was so basely cast.
Here behold him re-instated!
Here the Lord Protector greet!
Here his greatness renovated
Heedfully revolve, repeat!
Count his deeds and trophies over,
With his English heart confer—
Hail thy liveliest, lordliest lover
In thy mighty Oliver!

How the Lord Protector towereth
O'er the vulgar herd of Kings!
How his greatness theirs o'erpowereth!
How his fame their fame outrings!
How he wrought thine exaltation,
Spread thy sway, upraised thy name,
Set thee high above each nation,
France employed and Spain o'ercame!

Let thy heart's true love run over
In a still diviner stream—
Hail in him thy loftiest lover,
Greet thy Protestant supreme!
How the yoke of priests he spurnèd,
How the sway of Rome abhorred!
How to lift thy soul he yearnèd,
Earnest seeker of the Lord!
Christ's own freeman, how he longèd
That blest freedom to extend—
Fellow freeman sorely wrongèd
How he gloried to defend!
Mark those noble tears that streamèd
O'er the "slaughtered saints" of God—
How the remnant he redeemèd,
How he stayed the oppressor's rod.
Grandly were those wrongs redressèd,
Grandly was that rescue wrought;
Milton's voice sublime expressèd
All that Cromwell felt and thought.
What time hath that time transcended,
When thy sovran Soul of Light
With meet utterance attended
On thy mightiest man of might—
When to him it was assignèd
Thy high will to testify,
Who of all mankind combinèd
Lore most large, thought, speech most high?

Nor forget that sea-King glorious
Who so strongly strove for thee,
Whose high heart and arm victorious
Spread thy might and majesty.
O'er this splendour of thy story,
England, into glad song break
Link in fellowship of glory
Milton, Oliver and Blake—
Not in equalness—transcendent
Towereth Milton's soul sublime;
His the glory most resplendent
Of that age as of all time.
Cromwell then his light uncovers,
Blake his noble presence grants—
All of England fervent lovers,
All transcendent Protestants.
Of that time fresh heed be taken!
May this statue stir thy soul,
All her inmost life awaken
All her depth and height unroll!
May'st thou yet the gifts inherit
Of that solemn age sublime,
Not unmingled with the spirit
Of this wider, tenderer time.

Thomas Hornblower Gill.

A JEWISH TRIBUTE TO DR. MARTINEAU.

In the Jewish Chronicle of Jan. 26, a sermon in memory of Dr. Martineau was published, preached at the Synagogue, Upper Berkeley-street, on the previous Sabbath, by the Rev. Morris Joseph. The following passages are taken from the sermon:—

"If five years ago an expression of homage to this great master of religious thought was not out of place in this synagogue, it is eminently appropriate now that he is no more. For his life was one long battle for the truth, for religious truth; and that, unless we have forgotten the principles which have made us a congregation, that is the cause which is dearest to us all. Nay, conscience was his guide, his law; he 'reverenced' it 'as his king.' And what has not Israel dared and suffered for conscience' sake? Yet more, he gave himself heart and soul to that task of ennobling men's thoughts about God, which constitutes the life-work of our race. He strove to bring one step nearer the Messianic day when all men 'shall cast away their idols to the moles and to the bats,' and turn to the true God with one accord—the day upon which the thoughts of the ancient Prophets were longingly fixed, and to which, under their inspiration, we are still looking forward. And so he was our comrade, fighting in the same holy cause, one of the greater Israel, one of the mighty company of the world's elect whom God hath taken hold of with His right hand.

"It is this thought that especially moves us to regard his death as a personal loss. His fine character, his single-hearted devotion to the truth and the right, his humility, his large-mindedness, which came with the force of a practical lesson to myself on one of the few occasions on which I conversed with him, his lofty independence, which led him to relinquish his first ministry because it would have made him a pensioner of the State—this was full of charm and inspiration. But what concerns us chiefly as a congregation is the zeal he evinced for the living God, for our God.

"Here and there, amid the turmoil of voices babbling about divine things, we discern one with the live prophetic ring, one that echoes the clear, convincing tones of a Moses and an Isaiah. Here and there, amid the surging crowd, we descry the figure of the seer, whose soul, scorning lower planes of thought, soars eagle-like straight to the sun. Such a soul was his of whom I am speaking. Never was there a man more impatient of the mere conventions of religion. God had talked with him from Heaven, and therefore he could not make for himself idols of silver or gold. He had heard the Sinaitic voice; and who, having heard it, shall trifle with the play-things of a pagan world? The altar of earth—that was the medium of his worship. A lowly heart, bred of an overmastering sense of the Infinite—that was his tribute to the living God. "Thrice holy," cried the universe to him as with an angel's voice, and he reverently adored a grandeur that he could not fathom. And yet nothing stood between him and the Supreme. In the true Jewish temper he felt that as a son of the All-father he could commune with the paternal heart without mediating aid.

"That this is no untrue account of the man is patent to everyone who knew him, however slightly, or followed his work. Implicit faith enveloped him like an atmosphere, and those who came near him breathed it in, with all its invigorating effects upon the spiritual life. But, child-like as was his trust, he was a manly champion of the truth. He was essentially a religious reformer. If with his philosophic mind he compelled the respect of Science for the great verities of Religion, his historic knowledge helped to dispel many of the superstitions that had found their way into his ancestral faith. No man of the century has done more to lead Christian thought back to that primitive religion which was hardly distinguishable from Judaism. And yet, never was there a more ardent believer. He was not a greater foe of superstition than of religious vagueness. For him, the Divine was very real. He fought against 'ideal substitutes' for the Supreme, against such a conception as the 'stream of tendency which makes for righteousness,' no less strenuously than against the Trinity and the Incarnation. But, ardent believer though he was, he knew how to put belief in its true place. Early in life he insisted upon 'the moral innocence of mental error.' No one, he held, was to be accounted a sinner because he could not fashion his creed after a certain pattern. Like our own great teachers, he maintained that what counts with God is not belief, but life.

"He has 'seen of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied.' Has his life no word of exhortation for us? Ah, yes. 'Wir heissen euch hoffen'—'we bid you hope'—such is the message, the poet tells us, of all such great spirits. 'Work on'—this also they say. If we have the truth, let us hold it fast, and publish it, never wearying, never despairing. We Reformers—let us stand firm; the principles we upheld in bygone years are as living as ever. We Israelites—let us stand firm; the ideas for which our fathers died are as sacred, as precious as ever. Still the world has to come near to the living God, the God of the Decalogue, the Infinite Spirit of the universe, whom idols, both old and new, can only dishonour, the thrice holy Being whose glory fills the earth. Let us stand firm, then; let us be strong and of good courage. And as for him who has gone to his rest, to him we may fitly apply this Rabbinic paraphrase of the prophet's cry:—'Open ye the Heavenly gates that the righteous Gentile that keepeth the truth may enter in.'"

THE PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNALS.

Among many excellent articles in the January number of the International Journal of Ethics there is one which is of special interest to theologians and ministers of religion. It is entitled "The Ethics of Forgiveness," and is from the pen of Dr. Hastings Rashdall, the eminent Broad Churchman of Oxford University. This able paper also possesses additional attraction for our readers, from the circumstance that it was read before the "Martineau Society" in Manchester College. In very much of Dr. Rashdall's very thoughtful philosophical writing there is a near affinity between his views and those of the great teacher after whom the above society is named; but in this particular essay Dr. Rashdall travels along lines of reflection and argument, through a great part of which Dr. Martineau would, we think, have been unable to accompany him. One leading object of the paper is to overthrow what is called "the retributive theory" of punishment, and to replace it by what Dr. Rashdall calls the "educational theory."

In our author's view, "punishment and forgiveness, when they are what they ought to be, being alike the expression of love, the mode and degree of their combination will likewise be only the application of the general precept of love to the circumstances of the particular case"; and this principle of love is so interpreted as to make the expediency and legitimacy of punishment and forgiveness in each particular case depend entirely on considerations of "social well-being." It is true that Dr. Rashdall also says that in the social welfare or good he assigns "a paramount place to moral well-being." But the weak point in Dr. Rashdall's ingenious reasoning appears to us to lie in this, that he does not seem to see that if we make the ultimate justification of punishment and forgiveness to depend entirely on the social results which follow from them, we run a serious risk of weakening and undermining reverence for the supreme claims of the moral ideal by making our necessarily imperfect judgments about the conditions of social well-being supersede the intuitive perception of the absolute claims upon us of veracity and justice. The association of the ideas of suffering and punishment with the ideas of sin and crime rests upon the immediate experience of each man's self-consciousness that a wilful violation of the absolute claims of the moral ideal carries with it essentially the pain of self-condemnation and remorse as well as the physical and mental penal consequences which inevitably follow upon wilful wrong-doing. Accordingly, one important object which society has in view in apportioning punishment to criminals is to give social expression to the deep inward consciousness that sin and crime necessarily involve the exclusion of the sinner or the criminal, until he repents, from the pleasures and satisfactions which attend conscious harmony with the eternal Moral Law, or with what the religious man calls God's self-revelation in the human soul. It is perfectly true that it is Divine Love which eternally associates sin and crime with punishment; but, we take it, the very aim of this Divine Love would be in part frustrated if the legitimacy of punishment and of forgiveness were made to rest ultimately upon an appeal to the requirements of social welfare.

The following paragraph of the paper, in which Dr. Rashdall applies his theory of forgiveness to the orthodox doctrine of the Atonement, shows how faint is the dividing line which separates Dr. Rashdall's view of this dogma from that commonly held among us:—

When we look upon punishment and forgiveness alike as different ways of producing a moral result, when we have got rid of the notion that punishment can be either demanded or justified except as a means of producing an effect, or that forgiveness can be legitimate except where forgiveness will do the work of punishment, there will be an end of theories which represent the work of Christ as some mysterious device for cancelling past guilt or remitting a penalty which might justly have been inflicted. The atoning efficacy of the life and death of Christ will have to be found in their actual moral effects—the actual effect made upon the human soul by Christ's teaching about God's Nature and God's Will, by the influence of His character, and by the conviction that in that human love of Christ there is a revelation of the Divine.

The current number of Mind well sustains the usual high level of this chief representative of British philosophical thought. In a paper on "Criteria of Truth and Error," Professor H. Sidgwick directs his criticism especially against Mr. Spencer's ultimate test of a true proposition—namely, the inconceivability of its opposite, and he contends that, however conclusive this test may be when applied to the necessary principles of mathematics, it quite fails when used, as Mr. Spencer uses it, to prove the reality of the external world as separate from the perceiving mind. The veteran exponent of the philosophy of evolution will not, we think, find much difficulty in defending himself from the Cambridge professor's assault. There is also a very elaborate and important article by Mr. F. H. Bradley, entitled "A Defence of Phenomenalism in Psychology," in which he attacks in his usual trenchant style the views of such thinkers as Dr. Stout, the editor of Mind, and of Professor A. Seth, of Edinburgh, who will no doubt soon enter the lists in defence of their own position. We are glad to see that Mr. Bradley refers to our friend Dr. Mellone's able work on "Philosophical Criticism and Construction" in a way which shows that he has thought the book well worth careful reading. In another article, on "Green's Refutation of Empiricism," Mr. H. V. Knox, of Oxford, makes a vigorous onslaught on Green's "Absolute Idealism," and shows that it contains as many inherent inconsistencies as Green himself so diligently hunted out in the Sensational Idealism of Hume.

The Philosophical Review for January contains a brilliantly-written paper on "Conscience," by Professor Frank Thilly, of the University of Missouri, who also contributes an article on "The Moral Law" to the International Journal of Ethics. In both papers Professor Thilly advocates a utilitarian interpretation of ethics, but, like Professor H. Sidgwick, he holds that there is one rational intuition on which all ethical reasoning rests. Why, he asks, are we bound to care for the welfare of our fellows? To this question, he says, "No answer can be given. We have struck the bed-rock of ethics. The imperative 'Love thy neighbour' is categorical. This is the fundamental law of morality. This is the principle for which we have been seeking, from which all morality springs." There is also in this number an instructive and readable paper on "Contemporary French Philosophy" by M. Fr. Paulhau. Among "Reviews of Books" is one lengthy notice of Dr. Ward's "Gifford Lectures" by Professor Eliza Ritchie, and a very thoughtful estimate of Hugo Münsterberg's "Psychology and Life" by one of the Editors, Professor Creighton. The numerous summaries of important philosophical articles in other journals, which forms the distinctive feature of the Philosophical Review, add much to its interest and value for the students of current philosophy.

THE MINISTERS' MEMORIAL.

Sir,—Certainly not one of us who signed the memorial could have dreamed that we were committing those who did not sign it to complicity with our views. If the fear of doing this is to restrain us, we shall all together be reduced to silence, or must limit our utterances to such commonplaces as "War is evil," "Peace is desirable." No single minister can speak or write, or sign a petition, or do anything else good or evil, without involving his own congregation and his brother ministers to the extent that people who know nothing about us may take him as a representative of others. Everybody whose opinion is worth having must know that the ministers' memorial does not mean that "Unitarians have pronounced against the war," and no one but a fool will suppose that those who have refused to sign agree with those who have signed. So Mr. Jacks may rest assured that he will not be accused of joining with us in "deploring the war" or "urging negotiations for peace." If I had it in my power I would make it known as widely as the memorial has been made known that the signatories were somewhat less than half the number on our Ministers' Roll; though I don't believe anyone supposes the contrary.

What I confess, and do not regret, is that Mr. Jacks is involved in the charges of intellectual and moral feebleness against his brother ministers. People will not say "So Unitarians are against the war" because 150 of us have expressed our desire for peace; but if they accept Mr. Jacks' view they will say "What fools Unitarian ministers are! Why, half of them, including some of their leading men, have been signing 'a meaningless document,' convicting themselves 'of want of moral earnestness and common sense'—petitioning the Government 'to end the conflict by asking and accepting the Boers' terms of peace'! One may safely judge the whole lot by such a big sample!'"

My letter was simply a warning that if we take to calling one another names, the accusations we make will recoil upon ourselves. My friend Mr. Jacks disagrees with me. He is as good a man as I am, and he may be in the right and I may be in the wrong. If I were to call him and Mr. Solly and the like un-Christian, false to their professions, preachers of strife and bloodshed, I should be blackening the character of our whole ministry, and should myself share in whatever ill-fame I had brought upon them. Let us differ—we cannot help it, and we have no wish for uniformity of opinion—but let us manage to speak with respect of one another. Charles Hargrove.

Sir,—I find that it is widely supposed that all the ministers who did not sign the circular concerning the war are violent Imperialists, desiring to seize at once both territory and gold-mines which belong to others. I believe that many who did not sign would very willingly have done so, had the circular included a word about disarmament. I, for one, could not view with satisfaction any compact with the Boers on our initiative which, while leaving to them every inch of territory and every ounce of gold they now possess, permitted them to make their land one vast store-house of war material, compelling us to maintain, as Mr. Solly has ably pointed out, a large army on the frontier. It seemed to me that some mutual arrangement as to the armaments which each side might keep up within a certain distance of the frontier would be a most necessary and important stipulation. And would it not have been worth while to insist that henceforth the Boers should treat the black natives with less cruelty and with more consideration? But the question for all of us now is, not who signed or did not sign the circular, but what shall we do at Leicester? Is it not possible for us with more united voice to accept some resolution against the threatened total extinction of two little free nations which notwithstanding all their faults are surely entitled to some place in our regard? Or, if such a resolution be deemed too dangerous for us in our divided state of feeling, could we not all join in the demand that our Government should now tell the Boers and all the world what the British terms of peace really are? Must we be as dumb as the Free Church Council? J. Collins Odgers.

Bury, March 21.

Sir,—I have no wish to take part in the strife of tongues; but as a cloud of misunderstanding has been raised around the Address to Lord Salisbury which was signed by me, among others, it seems only right to point out a few facts. The Address expresses no opinion whatever about the causes of the war, and pronounces no censure upon anyone. The only terms of a settlement which it suggests are that the integrity of British territory should be assured, and that justice should be accorded to British subjects resident in the Transvaal. For the rest, it suggests the spirit in which terms should be settled, and the object which should be primarily sought. The object is the promotion of "relations of kindness and goodwill between the English and Dutch races in South Africa." The spirit is given almost in the words of Lord Salisbury and Lord G. Hamilton. The former said at the Guildhall Banquet (according to newspaper report), about a month after the beginning of the war, "We seek no goldfields, we seek no territory; what we desire is equal rights for all men of all races, and security for our fellow-subjects and for the Empire." The latter said at Ealing—I believe on Nov. 1—"The contest could have but one issue—our success. When that success was attained, and the terms which we proposed as victors to the vanquished were known, then foreign nations would, he believed, change their feelings towards us. Then they would see that the main cause which forced us to embark on this conflict was not a desire for pecuniary profit or territorial aggrandisement."

I am still reluctant to believe that many Unitarians are opposed to this wise policy, which the memorialists have desired, in their humble way, to support; but it is becoming increasingly evident that the Government will need all the support that can be given to it to prevent its being influenced by vindictive and reckless councils. The Memorial says nothing of the particular methods by which the desirable result is to be obtained, and probably very different opinions are entertained among those who signed it. It is for statesmen to settle the most judicious terms; but to prevent misapprehension, I may say for myself that I do not see that we can now ensure good government and permanent peace if we stop short of annexation, while I think that under that condition the most liberal home-rule should be granted, and every care should be taken to deal generously with the Dutch population.

My friend Mr. J. T. Preston objects to something which is really in the Memorial, and does not think that overtures for peace should come from our side. That is a point on which we may differ without excitement. I think that the proclamation of our terms, in broad outline, could not do any harm to us or to our colonial brethren, and might have the effect of weakening the war party in Pretoria, and so hastening the advent of peace, and perhaps also of conciliating the goodwill of foreign Powers. To go on fighting, if by making known our moderation we could bring the war to an end would surely, as it appears to me, be both unwise and wrong. James Drummond.

THE INDIAN FAMINE.

Sir,—Would you allow me to draw your attention to the fact that our ally from America, Rev. J. T. Sunderland, is pleading for the cause of God in India, and is able to do it in a column and a half of your last issue, whilst, on the other hand, some three columns or so of that same issue moot our own cause—i.e., our credit or our discredit in knocking at the door of the Foreign Office. Whatever our views of the war, we do not argue them on empty stomachs. War or no war, all the same an awful horror—slow starvation and death—is at work in a land with whose religious condition we are deeply concerned.

With the question of special or general channel for Unitarian contributions I am not concerned. But this I would—namely, that more were done by us to stir ourselves up and to stir one another up in sending all the possible relief that can be sent to a land where every one of our shillings will keep a native alive for a week.

Is there one household of our faith that discusses the war in South Africa and does not open its hand and uplift its heart to "deal its bread to the hungry"?

As is the need, so should be the heed.

Belfast, March 18. R. J. Orr.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.

Sir,—Referring to the appeal of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland in last week's Inquirer, on behalf of the immense number of sufferers from famine in India, I wish to say that, as chairman of the Indian Sub-Committee of the B. and F.U.A., I have very gladly undertaken to receive and forward to the Brahmo Somaj donations sent to me for this purpose.

I shall ask the president, Mr. A. M. Bose, in consultation with the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams and the Calcutta Committee, to undertake the administration of the Fund.

I believe the money will be carefully and impartially distributed over a wide area by means of the small missions of Brahmo Somaj workers, many of whom were employed by the Government at the time of the last famine to distribute relief. I desire now to acknowledge receipt of the undermentioned sums.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

Sir,—We are endeavouring quite early this year to make satisfactory arrangements with regard to the homes for the children sent away by the Country Holiday Movement, and I venture to make an appeal through your columns to friends in the country.

In order that our work may be carried on efficiently, it is essential that ladies in the country should make themselves responsible for the cottage homes. The children will not be properly treated unless the ladies carefully examine the accommodation provided. On the other hand, they have to remember that the work of the cottage mother is not an easy one. The children from London are sometimes delicate, and are a great responsibility. More often they are noisy and mischievous (long days, with nothing to do but enjoy themselves, tries the character of even the best boy); the cottage mother needs patience and wisdom. The lady must act as general referee in these matters, and without such assistance the cottagers get discouraged. Often a few words pointing out that the work is that of the good Samaritan (for such it really is) tides the difficulty over and peace is made.

For help of this kind I now make an earnest appeal. Will any ladies living in the country be willing to undertake the work of finding cottages and looking after the children for a few weeks during this summer? Even if at some distance from London the Committee would possibly be willing to overlook the payment of increased railway fare, for the children do better in the parts quite away from any town. Annie J. Lawrence.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"If I were a cobbler, I'd make it my pride
The best of all cobblers to be;
If I were a tinker, no tinker beside Should mend an old kettle like me:
But whether a tinker or whether a lord,
Whatever my station may be,
Determined to play second-fiddle to none,
I'll climb to the top of the tree:
Let who will be second, the first I'm determined to be!"

Do you sing that as a round or catch? We did when we were children. It is a capital little verse, and you had better all remember it and try to carry it out.

At first sight you may say, "What a selfish fellow, and how conceited, to think that he must always be first! other people want to be first, too." But that is just the beauty of it: one being "first" does not prevent others being first; it is a prize open to all. If the cobbler really made himself a first-rate cobbler, all the other cobblers could be first-rate ones also; and no tinker that mended that old kettle in the best possible way would, in the least, prevent any other tinker doing the same. Every workman who loves to do good work, and cares for the credit of himself and his trade, can be a first-rate workman. It is very much to be wished that in every class there were more people like that cobbler and that tinker. What of boys and girls with their work? Do they all determine to be the best of all scholars, the best of all boys and girls? What of that boy who is in such a hurry over his translation that he doesn't take the trouble to fetch the dictionary, and makes a guess at the words? How about those girls who forget or neglect to learn their poetry, and when it comes to their turn to say a few lines, cannot do it, or (worse still) hold the book beneath the table, and read the lines they should have learnt? Not only boys and girls, but grown men and women often do their work only with a view to getting through it, and not because they love it and love to do it well. Sometimes a housemaid who can hardly get through her work on ordinary days can get it done in half the time when she wants to go out. Children who scamp their lessons on common days will try and work hard if there is a prize to be won.

But there is always a prize to be won. The prize is the knowledge you gain. What use are those few lines of poetry to you if you read them on the sly, instead of having them in your mind to repeat? But if you learn well, and care for what you learn, and make it a part of you, it will remain by you always; and when you are ill, or blind, or away from books, or old, you will have a store of things in your mind which will be your companions in lonely hours.

When there is a prize to be won it is "worth while" to take trouble, and to work hard, and to try to be "best"; but as there is always a prize ahead—of being "best"—it is always worth while to work hard and well; and there is nothing that is worth doing at all that is not worth doing well.

We all know how provoking it is, and how troublesome, when work is ill done: when the rooms are not well cleaned; when your boats are left dirty; when the dinner is badly cooked; when the plumber mends one pipe, and leaves a leak in another; when the carpenter does not make the doors and windows shut well; when the stitching in your clothes comes undone. All this sort of work is dishonest; when we send for someone to do the work, and pay them for it, we expect to have it really done, and not scamped; it is also deceit, because they pretend and wish you to think that they have done the work properly. It is the same with the children and their lessons; it is dishonest to do less than their best, and to try and escape being found out by something not quite straightforward and above-board—in fact by some deceit. We all understand that a man who gives false weight or measure, in trade, is a dishonest, cheating person; but we do not always see ourselves in the same light when we do bad work, or incompletely do what we ought to do well. In the Book of Micah (vi. verse 11) occur these words: "Shall I be pure with wicked balances, and with a bag of deceitful weights?" In the old town of Nürenberg there is still shown to visitors a large cage in which, in former days, the people used to be shut up who used false weights and measures, and when shut up in the cage they were taken to the river and ducked.

There was a little girl who came every week to me for a drawing lesson. She was very fond of her drawing, and on the whole did well, but she was very random, and often spoiled a good drawing by carelessness. But still, hope always revived; and when she was to begin a fresh drawing she rushed into the room, flung off her jacket and hat, pushed back her hair and sat down, saying "Now! this is to be a little gem!" And that hope made her work so well and brightly and spurred her on so well, that though, perhaps, the "little gem" never came, still she tried her best, and her intention was the same as the cobbler's and the tinker's, to be "best," and to do best work.

A mother who came to say good-night to her little girl in bed, found that when she had told her to mend her night-gown she had "cobble-stitched" it; and when the mother remarked on it the child crumpled it up in her hands to hide it; but her mother told her that she should always have her clothes so neat as never to be ashamed for them to be seen. Yes, but not only that, they should be well mended even if no one ever saw them. What does God do? Does He not dress every place, however solitary, with lovely grass and flowers, or ice and snow—even where no eye ever looks? Does not He love good work and show us that He makes all things beautiful for the pure love of beauty and order? Is not His work "best," and are we not to be perfect as He is perfect?

"Whatever our station may be," let us do our own work in the best way, and "climb to the top of the tree," and not be dragged down to anything lower by companions, or ridicule, or bad advice.

There is one shoemaker that I know that uses such good materials and makes such good boots that the only difficulty is ever to wear them out; and they get out of shape and look battered whilst they are still quite sound. He does all the work himself now because he could never find any man that did the work well enough to satisfy him. I think that is partly why so many people can't get work—that they do it so badly.

Now, children, you will not be like the bad worker, but will try to do "best" work, to make "little gems"; and to mend your old kettles so that they will hold the water for as long as possible.

LONDON, MARCH 24, 1900.

Professor Godet, Dean Farrar, Dean Fremantle, Professor Adeney, and Dr. Marcus Dods; and there are other vigorous and capable writers, including the Rev. Bernard Snell and Dr. John Hunter.

Dr. Forsyth, who has a place in the series, repeats the views more fully expressed at Boston and in the October Contemporary—views with which we dealt in The Inquirer of Nov. 18. He urges again that "the Cross is penal," and that we must get back to "the religious principle of expiation," if we would realise "the essence of its value for the soul and the real secret of the Church's action on the world." But while several other writers emphasise the fact that there has been from the first a wonderful power in the passionate preaching of redemption through the cross of Christ, and that throughout the world this has been the secret of missionary success, they are by no means agreed as to the interpretation of the fact, and in several cases there is a striking divergence from the lofty assumptions of Dr. Forsyth's position.

It is a great gain that all the writers admit the purpose of the Atonement to be, not to reconcile God to man (for which there is no need), but man to God; and this, in spite of the Fourth Article's "to reconcile the Father unto us," which Dean Farrar says, "may be capable of being rightly explained." There is also a general agreement that the death of Christ should not be isolated from his life, though here the divergence of view as to the meaning of both life and death is most marked. Thus Dr. Forsyth, insisting that Christ suffered on the cross the penalty of sin, holds that his life of obedience cannot be separated from his "expiatory death."

His whole person was expiatory in its ultimate function and supreme work. It was on this ground that He forgave sin during His life. Each miracle cost, and was preceded by, a small Passion. His sorrowful existence was an expiation. All His sufferings were death in advance, deaths manifold, chastisements of sin, and in their nature expiatory. He was inwardly in deaths often before He died the outward death.

Professor Harnack, on the other hand, finds the great purpose of both the life and death of Christ in the conviction brought home to sinners of the Divine compassion and love. The conception of God as a wrathful Judge is indeed false, yet it naturally arises from terror and despair in the sense of guilt. Christ, says Professor Harnack, led his disciples to the Father, and revealed God as eternal Love. God has not to be turned from wrath to love, nor has anything to be paid or sacrificed in order that He may love and forgive. But the sinner has to be convinced of this. To give men a truer conception of God, which would make Him their Redeemer from sin, was the work of Christ, and that is the fundamental idea of the Atonement.

When the Holy One descends to sinners, when He lives with them and walks with them, when He does not count them as unworthy but calls them His brethren, when He serves them and dies for them, then their terror of the awful Judge melts away, and they believe that the Holy One is Love, and that there is something mightier still than Justice—Mercy. It is in relation to these human conceptions that we have specially to regard the death of Christ. His death is thus the culminating point of the service which He rendered for sinners during His mission. This service had the single object of convincing sinners that forgiving Love is mightier than the Justice before which they tremble. If they believe this they are reconciled, and in this manner is the God of punitive justice reconciled. They now know God as their Redeemer, but they also know Jesus Christ as their Reconciler.

Professor Sabatier, again, speaks of the life and death of Christ as a sacrifice, because of his perfect love; but it was self-sacrifice for his brethren's sake, as the supreme instance of redeeming love.

Expiation, regarded in this way as an act essentially moral and human, relates itself to the universal law of the moral world, a law that rules us all and always, and which determines that those who love shall suffer in themselves a part, greater or less, of what is suffered by those whom they seek to save. The world becomes delivered from the burden of its sin and misery by the innocent and devoted love of those who charge themselves with it. The mother suffers for her erring son, and reclaims him by that suffering. That is the general law of redemption by love. However supernatural and unique the way in which we represent it, the expiatory work of Jesus is neither isolated nor incomprehensible. It is related to the law which it reveals and compels us to accept, that all love pays a ransom proportioned to its intensity and devotion. The sacrifice of Christ is the great redeeming sacrifice because, while this love is only partial amongst the best of other men and full of reserves, His love was perfect and His gift of Himself absolute.

Thus Jesus "remains the Chief in Redemption and the Conqueror of sin and death," but those who come after him and learn of him the secret of self-sacrificing love fill up the measure of "the sufferings of Christ," and do their part towards the perfect redemption of mankind.

Dean Fremantle goes even a step further in contemplating possible changes of thought, and yet returns to the sentiment of the Cross.

It is possible, indeed, that future generations may not need these explanations, and that the sense of God's Fatherhood and His indwelling or immanence may become so habitual to those who have been brought up under the influence of a truer and simpler Christianity, that mercy and forgiveness will be presupposed from the first, and the whole stress of the Christian life be laid on the following of Christ. But we can hardly assume this. Through all these nineteen centuries the first great need of burdened souls has been to know that God has pardoned them, and to be assured of this, not by word, but by the sacrifice of the Cross. It is a great thing to Christian teachers to know that they can preach the Cross without any misrepresentation of the justice and the love of God.

Mr. Snell utters an earnest plea, that the teaching of Jesus himself should be the standard by which all theories of the Atonement must be judged. The teaching of Jesus was revolutionary. He unveiled the love of the Father, and thereby extinguished the ancient error of the need of sacrifice to propitiate the Deity. As to the necessity for his sufferings, Mr. Snell's view is thus expressed:—

In the world we know, unless Christ had suffered, we should never have gained,

I say not an adequate, but an approximate idea of His devotion and love. That was the culmination of His lifelong obedience, the supreme proof of His fidelity to the Father. So He finished the work, which was given Him to do—the manifestation of the love of God; so He became the Mediator, perfect through sufferings. Doing the will of God to the end, He made the complete sacrifice. His cross was the climax of a lifelong sacrifice, and in the light that streams from it Christ's Gospel is glorified.

And finally Dr. Hunter sets the doctrine in the clear light of modern thought, as determined by the conviction that there has been an ordered evolution of human life in things spiritual as well as physical. In "the purer and more spiritual religion of the future" the old doctrine of Atonement will have no place. "To be one with God is the Atonement which is the profound and vital need of humanity, and the making of humanity one with God—the process of realising the Divine ideal—is the work of the Atonement." "In the life of Jesus, we see, as in a visible parable, what it is for man to be one with God. He is the historical representative of that perfect union of the human and Divine of which the constitution and experience of man have always been the prophecy."

Growth is the law of the world. The sense of sin is not the sign of degeneration, but of a moral uprising. It is, as Carlyle says, "the beginning of all progress," and until it is awakened, man is little more than an animal. What we see, when we look back, is man rising through many struggles to his true life, seeking God by a law of his being. "Nearer, my God, to Thee," "Restless, till I rest in Thee," are words which interpret the conscious and unconscious aspiration and movement of man's whole life upon this earth. Because man is what he is he cannot remain satisfied in the outer circles of being, or endure to be far away from Him who is the Beginning and the End of his life. Toward and into that inner circle of unity between Father and Son he must press and enter, if his life is to be anything but a living death. From this point of view, the Atonement that is a vital need is no making up of a previous strife, but the fulfilment of the Divine idea of man. It is effected through self-development and self-realisation. Man comes to God as he comes to himself; and to come to himself he must come to God.

"There is no other way of Atonement," Dr. Hunter adds, "than the way of obedience—every man's free obedience to the Divine laws of his being and life." To that end God has been always working in human life, for "it is the essential nature of love to seek and to save." The Atonement, therefore, is an unfinished, continuous, and progressive work.

It was not a new and strange work the Beloved Son of God came to do, but the work which He saw His Father doing continuously. The Divine mission of Jesus is not so much an isolated interpolation in human history, as the reflection and revelation of the universal and eternal labour, passion, and sacrifice of God. . . . The entire manifestation of the Son of God, and not merely the death on the cross, was and is the power of Atonement in the life of Jesus Christ. . . . Whatever prophecies there may have been of the Divine Sonship of humanity in the experience of men in the past, it came forth into clear and complete consciousness for the first time in Him who said, "I and my Father are one." It is this perfect realisation of filial union and communion with God that is the central fact of our Christian faith.

Dr. Hunter, as it appears to us, of all the writers in the series, has come nearest to the truth in regard to the doctrine of the Atonement, and his whole article, which appeared in the Christian World of Feb. 22, will well repay careful study. The complete series is most significant of progressive thought, and we should have been glad to quote more than we have done from other of the articles; but we are specially grateful for what Dr. Hunter and Mr. Snell have written, so fearless in its outspokenness, strong in a healthy humanity and instinct with spiritual wisdom. Without going any further, either in criticism or in constructive thought, on this great theme of the life at one with God, we leave these echoes of much helpful teaching for the consideration of our readers.

THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS.—II.

THE COST OF FORGIVENESS.

In a first article the attempt was made to define the connection between the Fatherhood of God and the Forgiveness of Sins. It was maintained that one of these articles of belief is required to interpret the other, and that the former, taken in isolation, fails to give an adequate representation of the contents of Christian faith. It was further said that, in order to preserve the redeeming power of the doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood, it was necessary to realise what Forgiveness costs. What follows is an endeavour to justify that statement.

We have travelled so far from any view of the Atonement which obliges us to use the terms of barter and exchange and depicts the Divine Forgiveness as a quasi-commercial transaction, that many may be unwilling to attach any further meaning to such an expression as "the cost of forgiveness." Nevertheless, the phrase will be found to act as something of a safeguard against too complete a recoil from theories which, however great their defects, excluded the shallow and immoral notion of a wholly gratuitous forgiveness. Let us perfectly understand ourselves when we declare that in such a matter as the exercise of Divine Mercy there can be no question of cost. Let us take care that we have not so far made ourselves the victims of a word as to rest in the belief that Forgiveness costs the Father nothing. It is still true that we are "bought with a price."

I defined Forgiveness, when realised in experience, as the restoration of that certainty of the Divine Love, the loss of which is the severest penalty of sin. When we recover our faith in Divine Mercy, we are being forgiven by God. It follows from what was said respecting the conveyance of the assurance of forgiveness that the Divine Forgiveness is mediated. We cannot ourselves convey the assurance to ourselves. The mere declaration of the possibility of forgiveness is of no avail in doing the work of forgiveness. Statements that redemption is practicable have no power to redeem. Forgiveness must become incarnate that it may forgive—i.e., may effect the assurance of forgiveness. The Father is the ultimate Forgiver, but "the son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins." To him is committed the ministry of absolution, of setting his fellows free from the burden of distrust in Divine Love.

For our purpose, then, we must turn from the recipient of forgiveness to the mediator or revealer of it. Having seen what passes in the consciousness of the forgiven, we examine what is involved in the experience of the forgiver. We may recall what passes when one who has wronged a fellow-man is forgiven by him whom he has wronged. The injurer desires forgiveness; he cannot, of course, receive it otherwise. He craves the assurance of pardon. How is his craving satisfied? No mere expression of forgiveness on the part of the injured will satisfy it. The bare recital of the words of pardon brings no sense of pardon. There must be conveyed to the mind of him who asks for pardon the certainty that he of whom he asks it understands precisely the meaning of the request. He must show that he comprehends the need that prompts the offender to make it. It must be made clear to the burdened conscience that the forgiver realises the weight of the burden and where it presses. He does not forgive if, while he utters the language of pardon, he shows that he is ignorant of the painful condition from which relief is sought.

Now we only realise the pain of another when we have made it our own. Not until we have so made it our own are we in a position to help to its removal. We cannot perform any service of consolation unless we have made real in our own consciousness the grief we would assuage. It is not otherwise with the Forgiveness of Sins. Just as he who would lighten the grief of another must grieve with him, so he who would loosen the burden from another's conscience must feel the sense of the burden as though it weighed upon his own. As, therefore, every desire for forgiveness springs from the pressure of an inner distress, so every response of the forgiver issues from one by whom that distress has been realised and shared. Every act of forgiveness is accompanied by suffering on the part of the forgiver. The Divine Forgiver, therefore, will be the Divine Sufferer.

It has been explained that the greatest pain which accompanies the conviction of sin is the sense of estrangement from God, the wreck of faith in His Love. He, then, who would ease us of this pain must share it with us, must realise in himself in some degree the poignant anguish of divorce from the living God. It is for this reason we cannot feel really forgiven by the man whom we have wronged, if we see that he is blind to this consequence of our misdoing and has no conception of what it means to us. He may be reconciled to us in so far as he wishes us no ill in return for our wrong, but he cannot reconcile us to God if he is unaware that we feel the need of it. Only he can reconcile us to God who realises the pain of estrangement from Him. The disease must be understood ere the healing can begin.

Furthermore, the healer is he who perceives the true virulence of the disease; if this is hidden from him his healing work is imperfect. Now, sinful men cannot of themselves gauge the full extent of the seriousness of their sin, they cannot unaided realise the whole meaning of that separation from Divine Holiness which it involves. They are conscious of pain, but its source is but dimly descried. For this reason no man, relying upon himself alone, can ever perfectly convey assurance of forgiveness to another. Who, then, can perfectly convey it? Obviously, he who perfectly understands the need and the source whence it springs. And this can only be one in whom perfect holiness and perfect love are met together. For it is only perfect holiness that understands the fulness of union with God, and only perfect love that can penetrate to the utter need of the unholy who miss that union, and register in its own bosom the stripes whereby they are healed. He who knows no sin is made sin on their behalf, that they may become the righteousness of God in him.

Christian faith has ever truly associated the Cross of Christ with the Forgiveness of Sins. There it has seen the climax and epitome of those "many things" which it behoved the Christ to suffer ere he entered into his glory. The significance of the Cross is not that it purchases our forgiveness, but that it reveals to us what forgiveness costs the Forgiver. The Holy One, perfect in love, cannot enter into communion with sinners except at the price of suffering. For immediately his love divines their state of alienation and provokes him to deliver them from it; but he cannot deliver them until he has so far identified himself with them that he feels their state as his own. He must feel their burden weighing upon his own shoulders. He must know, by the power of a measureless sympathy, all that is involved in the sense of estrangement from God, so that he shall even cry in the moment of its perception, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" This is, indeed, the essential death-hour of the Holy One, the consummation of his sacrifice. For in making his own this sense of alienation he parts with that sense of union which is the very life of his holiness.

He parts with it that he may take it again and bring within it those on whose behalf it was laid down. They know that he was not forsaken, though for their sakes it behoved him to realise that experience. They know that he did not rest in death but rose again, bringing life and immortality to light.

The suffering of Christ is the sovereign means of conveying the assurance of the Forgiveness of Sins, because it is the most perfect means of bringing home to us what forgiveness costs. The Cross is the revelation of the price at which every redemption is secured. In its light the heart of the Father discloses out of what depths are born His unspeakable mercies.

It may now be clear why the statement was ventured that the declaration that God is a Father does not represent "the whole sum of Christian teaching." It cannot do so while the Fatherhood lacks explicit definition. As long as it remains undefined we are at liberty to put into the notion what we will. The New Testament knows nothing of an undefined Fatherhood. No one "knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him." God is "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Here is its definition, and here its protection against elements that dilute and destroy it, for only in this way is made clear that the core and marrow of the doctrine is the Forgiveness of Sins.

Ambrose Bennett.

THE PRINCIPLE OF NON-RESISTANCE.

Sir,—I agree with Mr. N. M. Tayler, both in his dissent from your conclusions as to the Transvaal war, and in his gratitude to you for discussing the matter and allowing it to be discussed. But I am not now offering to take part in that discussion. I am writing rather to invite you to express yourself with equal explicitness on the abstract question which underlies this and many similar controversies, and which is pointedly raised by several of the utterances to which you have lately given special prominence. Are you on the side of Dr. McKennal, the Society of Friends, and Miss F. E. Cooke, or do you hold, with the majority of Englishmen, that there can be such a thing as a righteous war?

Even those who question (as I do not) the propriety of ministers and religious papers taking a side in political struggles will not dispute the propriety, and indeed the absolute necessity, of their trying to give clear guidance on this vital point of elementary ethics. For one thing, it is bound to crop up in some shape or other every week in every Sunday-school in which there is any serious attempt to adapt the teaching to the every-day practical needs of the scholars.

So much is this the case that I shall consider myself to be putting practically the same question in a simpler and more concrete form, if I ask you whether you approve of the moral inculcated by your popular and esteemed contributor, Miss Cooke, in the "Children Column" of your last number. Would you, yourself, tell a class of boys that Harry Wellman was right in declining to defend himself against the unprovoked attack of a boy of his own age? Would he have been equally right in declining to strike a blow on behalf of a smaller boy who looked to him for protection? [It is possible that you may see an important difference between these two cases, though I confess that I do not, because I know of no code of ethics which requires a man to love his neighbour better than himself.]

You will understand, of course, that I am not asking whether the boy was right in obeying the dictates of his conscience, but whether his conscience was rightly instructed. And please also understand that in order to make the case identical with that of a quarrel between independent nations, I assume that there was no person in authority to whom Harry could complain, and from whom he might expect protection. Most people who have not forgotten their schooldays will admit that this assumption is by no means a far-fetched one. It is, or used to be, matter of common knowledge that to expect the masters of a large school to act as policemen and judges in the ordinary quarrels of the playground would be very much like referring an injured nation to the Concert of Europe.

Note also that my question refers to things as they are. I am not asking whether a state of society is conceivable in which there would be no necessity, and therefore no justification, for the use of force, but whether the boy who, or the nation which, now and here, resolves to act consistently on the principle of non-resistance is likely to advance or to retard the Kingdom of God.

Should your answer to this question be in accordance with that of your contributor, I shall be tempted to inquire further, whether our Sunday-school teachers ought to be warned against eulogistic references to Alfred the Great, William the Silent, Washington, John Brown of Ossawattomie, or President Lincoln? And lastly, whether you are prepared to censure Mr. Page Hopps and his friends for calling on the police to clear the rioters out of Exeter Hall the other day? R. K. Wilson.

P.S.—It has nothing to do with the above letter, but if your space permits I should like to add a word of gratitude to Mr. Sunderland for his letter on the Indian Famine, and to the chairman of the Indian Committee for his satisfactory response thereto. My only regret is that action could not have been taken earlier, as there may be many who, like myself, would have been glad to subscribe as Unitarians through Mr. Ion Pritchard and Mr. Fletcher Williams, but have already sent what they had to give through other channels.

[We are quite willing to answer Sir Rowland Wilson's questions. We are not aware that either Dr. McKennal or Miss F. E. Cooke would say that there cannot be such a thing as a righteous war. We certainly do not hold that opinion. As the world has been growing up from the animal to the rational and the humane, war has been often inevitable, and a genuine war of liberation or of self-defence in a good cause, or in protection of the oppressed, we hold to be righteous. This, perhaps, will answer for the boy as well. We should say he was right to refuse to fight for personal ascendancy in the school, which is a very different thing from fighting (if it could not be avoided) in defence of a smaller boy. A brave man may refuse to resent personal insult by violence, though he would fight to the death in the cause of outraged innocence.—Ed. Inq.]

MANSFORD-STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

The eleventh annual meeting was held in the Mansford-street Church on Thursday evening, March 15, Mr. Charles W. Jones, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in the chair.

Mr. Stanton W. Preston read the Committee's report.

The report noted with satisfaction an increase in the number of congregational members, and a growing appreciation of the religious services. A Young Men's Club in connection with the church and mission had been established by Mr. Classon Drummond, who had fitted up two rooms in the Blyth-street premises for the purpose, where discussions and readings could be held, papers and magazines be seen, and bagatelle could be played. There were already forty subscribing members, and it was expected that the club would pay working expenses. The Provident Fund had again increased by £100 on the previous year, £614 having been received from 770 subscribers. The Committee recorded their appreciation of the services of their late treasurer, Mr. Holland, whose death had been a serious loss to the Society; Miss L. Jones had been good enough to undertake the duties. The Committee pointed out that in spite of liberal donations there was still a deficiency and a debt owing to the treasurer. Nearly £80 had to be paid in ground rent and rates. Increased support was urgently needed.

Miss Louisa Jones presented the treasurer's statement, showing a deficiency of £15 0s. 11d., with an expenditure of £417 9s. 1d. Subscriptions amounted to £263 18s., donations to £61 3s., grants from London District and B. and F.U.A. £50, collection at Rosslyn Hill Chapel £43.

Mr. W. J. Clark, in the absence of Mr. Classon Drummond through indisposition, read the congregational report, which showed great activity in the schools and in various activities throughout the week.

Mr. J. G. Foster presented the accounts of the congregation.

The Rev. W. G. Cadman then read his report, in which he said that, in spite of disappointments and discouragements, the year had been one of distinct progress. The closing of insanitary houses in the vicinity had caused a good deal of difficulty to the inhabitants, and some of their meetings had suffered in consequence. Yet the premises had never been so well used as at present. Their success in retaining elder scholars had rendered the young men's club, "The Preston Club," possible, and they were greatly indebted to Mr. Classon Drummond for its projection and establishment. The male adult class in the Sunday-school numbered twenty, and was a separate institution, meeting in one of the club rooms. A superintendent for the afternoon school was greatly needed, to set the minister free for other work.

The report also contained the following passages:—

While referring to the subject of "Thrift," it may be mentioned that a committee, of which your minister is a member, has for more than a year been sitting in Bethnal Green, to collect information of various kinds, and to adopt plans for encouraging thrift. Of late it has especially sought to promote co-operation between visitors and other workers among the people, on the one hand, and the officers of the great Friendly Societies, on the other, with a view to extending the operations of these societies.

It is unfortunate that so many, to whom thrift is of the utmost importance, fail to make provision for sickness till they become too old to do so. For this reason it is sought to open and extend Juvenile Branches of Foresters, Odd-Fellows, Rechabites, and other registered orders. Our schools would be put to admirable use if they offered homes for Lodges and Courts, free of expense or at a nominal rent, so as to dissociate them from the licensed premises where most Adult Societies of the kind at present meet. This would be as purely philanthropic as our Provident Society and Band of Hope work.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the reports, expressed his pleasure at being present, and commented on various points in the reports. The lack of teachers was chronic, but they should take some comfort in the thought that it meant they had a large number of children. The critics of their work in those missions sometimes complained that they were departing from the original intention of the founders, which was home-visitation of the poor. But he believed that if Dr. Tuckerman could come back and see their splendid buildings and the beneficent agencies at work in them, he would say, "That is what I intended."

But they still built upon the one foundation of personal ministry in the home. That was the part of the work that did not appear; but in their great Liverpool mission he was sure there was as much devoted home-visitation as there ever had been. Such a mission must start not with a building, but with a man, and if possible a man with a good wife. Then as they went about among the poor, the people would come to them, they would have small meetings in their house, and it would have to be enlarged, and as the work grew their buildings would increase; and whereas at first the missionary was supposed to persuade people whom he had wakened to fresh religious earnestness, to go back to churches with which they had been associated, it was soon found that the people would not be sent away, they wanted the ministrations of the friend who had helped them, and so services had to be held at the Mission. In addition to the home-visiting they could not provide too much healthy interest and recreation for the people, and too much stress could not be laid on the religious education of the children. The kind of teaching possible in the day-school was not religious education, that must rest with the teachers specially qualified, and a great responsibility was laid on their ministers.

The work of the Sunday-school was, therefore, of the utmost importance. He regretted that more of their young men did not take up the work. People complained that the bicycle was responsible for a good deal of the unwillingness to undertake such work on Sundays. The bicycle, he believed, was one of the greatest regenerators of the age; but he suggested that young people should ride in the early hours in the summer mornings—the most delightful hours of the day—and then they would have plenty of time to devote themselves to that unselfish work.

The Rev. Edgar Daplyn seconded the resolution, and expressed his admiration for the men who could devote themselves to that work. He was greatly impressed by the persistent faithfulness to which the report bore witness. The personal influence of a religious man was the great regenerating power; that power made itself felt through all the agencies of their mission, for the bettering of people's lives. Such an annual meeting was useful, as giving supporters an opportunity of learning how much admirable work was being done, and also for encouraging others to come and take part in the work, for the opportunities were limitless. And then there was the need of more generous financial support.

On the motion of Mr. Ion Pritchard, seconded by the Rev. F. Allen, the officers and Committee were appointed.

Mr. W. S. Preston then moved a resolution congratulating the Committee and Mr. Cadman on their work, but urging the need of a larger measure of support. From close personal acquaintance with the work, he spoke of its admirable quality. Their ideal was to make the mission a "church-home," and they largely succeeded. He appealed to young men to come forward as teachers, and to relieve Mr. Cadman of the duties of superintendent. They would find ample reward in the interest of such work. In conclusion, he spoke of the financial difficulty, which ought to be met.

The Rev. V. D. Davis seconded the motion, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. E. B. Squire, brought the meeting to a close.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.

The annual meeting was held in Stamford-street Chapel on Wednesday evening, Mr. J. F. Schwann in the chair, and there was a good attendance of the friends and supporters of the Mission.

The report of the Committee, which was read by Mr. A. A. Tayler, congratulated the subscribers on the solid progress made, and on the satisfactory balance-sheet, but pointed out that additional expense might soon have to be incurred, while several generous supporters had been lost through death, whose vacant places must be filled. Special reference was made to Dr. Martineau, Sir Philip Manfield, Mr. Stephen Busk, from whom a legacy of £50 had been received, Mrs. Colfox, Dr. R. T. Plimpton, and the Rev. Robert Spears, who became minister at Stamford-street in 1861.

Mr. C. F. Pearson presented the treasurer's accounts, showing receipts amounting to £451 10s. 9d., and a balance of £10 7s. 10d. in hand; but repeated the warning of the Committee's report that the balance would not continue, but would be very much the other way at the end of the present year unless substantial new subscriptions were received.

The Rev. F. Allen then read passages from his report as minister, having first referred to a message he had received from Miss Preston, who was kept from the meeting by ill-health, being absent for the first time for very many years from the annual meeting.

The report dwelt especially on the value of the Provident Bank, the accounts of which showed 24,661 visits paid and £845 16s. 3d. received, while more valuable even than the amount saved were the relations of sympathy established between the collectors and the people of the district. Thirty-two families had made use of the Summer Cottage at Raynes Park, and a number of children from the Sunday-school had enjoyed country holidays by the help of the London S.S. Society. The work of the Mothers' Meeting, the Young Women's Club, the Boys' Own Brigade, the Band of Hope and Mercy, the Children's Happy Evenings, and other activities were recorded. The annual Rummage Sale in November had produced £31 17s. The report concluded with an earnest appeal for "Faith and Works."

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the reports, spoke of the most excellent devoted work they recorded. It was not a work of yesterday, for that chapel represented a religious movement in that neighbourhood which went back as far as 1666, and there was at the present time as much of the vigour of youth in it as ever. The report of the Sunday-school showed an average morning attendance of 80, and in the afternoon 175. That was work which required energy and perseverance, but there was great reward in it, when they saw how the after-lives of the children were influenced. As to the parents, in such a district as that, where the people were exceedingly hard-worked during the week, they did not find them attending the Sunday services as much as they perhaps wished; but they might, nevertheless, feel that they often had the sympathy of the people, though they were not always present, but were resting at home or in the sunshine outside. The Social and Literary Union did not seem to have been as successful as they wished, but they must remember that the technical classes held in the neighbourhood would have a great attraction, and were doing a similar most admirable work for the people. He had himself been interested in such work for twenty-five years, and in his own district at Wimbledon had inaugurated such classes, first in a small house, until now they had a great institution with 1,000 or 1,200 young people in attendance, under the control of the Surrey County Council. He specially commended the work of the Provident Bank. The personal relations established, without intrusiveness, were of the greatest value, and other beneficent work naturally grew out of it. In connection with a Bank at the neighbouring University Settlement, a relative of his had taken up the care of crippled children, finding out what they could do; a number of them had been taught boot-making, and they were now making boots for the army; the same lady interested herself in the recreation of the girls, and a hockey club was being started for them. It was very satisfactory to see how that mission was taking hold of the life of the young people; there was no better work than such as they were doing, and he expressed the warmest sympathy of the supporters of the mission with all the workers there.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant seconded the motion, and referred to the various old congregations represented in that institution. While there would have been no real failure even if the chapel, under changed conditions, had been closed, yet they were glad to know that there was still a work to be done in that district, which would long be a residential quarter for working people. Their thought and their religious ideals were suited to the people, to their temperament and way of thinking. They were optimists in regard to human nature. Their teaching made towards the development of manhood and womanhood, and it was pleasant to see the young people trained in the schools becoming the working staff of the place. They were taught to be themselves, with reverence and trust in the Eternal, and to live virtuous and helpful lives.

Mr. J. T. Preston moved the appointment of the officers and Committee, with Messrs. C. F. Pearson and W. S. Tayler as treasurers, and A. A. Tayler and A. H. Biggs secretaries. He was glad to see that a balance of £25 had been placed towards a repairs fund, which he thought should be established by every congregation. At Unity Church they had had such a fund, and had spent from time to time from £500 to £600 in connection with their church building without any special calls, which were often the cause of trouble in congregations.

The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards seconded the motion, expressing his sympathy with the work.

Mr. S. S. Tayler moved a resolution of congratulation to the Rev. F. Allen and the other workers at the Mission, and thanks for their willing and persevering work. He referred to the coming of the Rev. R. Spears in 1861, when there were very few people left at the chapel, and how his indefatigable zeal had filled the chapel, and found further scope in connection with the Carter-lane Mission. They must be thankful for the large amount of good work now done by the technical classes and polytechnics. The special work done by their Mission was of the utmost importance, and must have their warmest sympathy.

The Rev. Harold Rylett seconded the resolution. Referring to the Boys' Brigade, he said he hoped the emphasis would be laid on making the boys into soldiers of the Cross, and that on those young lives would be impressed the paramount importance of going about doing good. As to attendance at the services, he strongly felt that the kind of influence a man exerted was of more importance than the number of people who came to hear him preach. There was more eloquence in his life and practical work among the people than in any sermons he could preach from the pulpit. They ought cordially to support all educational work carried on by public authorities, and let their own efforts fall into line with that. They must not be discouraged, for every bit of good work had good result, even when it was not apparent. What they did, they might be sure was for the uplifting of the world at large.

The Rev. F. Allen having responded to the resolution, a vote of thanks to the Chairman was passed on the motion of Mr. C. F. Pearson, seconded by Mr. Percy Preston; and a hymn and benediction brought the meeting to a close.

BELFAST DOMESTIC MISSION.

The annual sermons in connection with the Belfast Domestic Mission were preached on Sunday, March 4, by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., in the morning at the First Presbyterian Church, in the evening at All Souls' Church.

On the following Monday evening the annual meeting of the Society was held at the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, under the presidency of Mr. John Rogers.

Miss Bruce, hon. secretary, read the annual report, which contained the following:—

The Committee have met eight times since their appointment on March 13, 1899, and the relief Committee every week, except during the missionary's absence from home on his summer holiday. They have great pleasure in informing their subscribers and friends that they have found in Mr. and Mrs. Slipper even more earnest and energetic workers than they anticipated. The treasurer of the Provident Fund reports that the sum collected in 1899 is a little larger than in 1898, the number of depositors being the same. Particulars will be given in the annual report. The contributors to the Needlework Guild number thirty this year, and many valuable donations were sent to Mr. C. M. Cunningham, Rostellan, who kindly undertook to receive them. In conclusion, the Committee would again earnestly plead for more generous support. The money required for several purposes during this last year has had to be separately collected, and only those who have to beg know how distasteful the task is.

Mr. James Davidson (in the absence of the hon. treasurer, Mr. M'Fadden) submitted the accounts for the year, which showed a deficiency of £62 12s. 8d.

Mr. G. J. Slipper, the Society's missionary, read an interesting report dealing with his work throughout the year:—

It stated that there had been some progress. It had been a year of strenuous endeavour, and a fair measure of success had attended his labours. It had been his constant endeavour to remove the antipathy that existed in many hearts as to Christian ideals. It had been his lot to experience opposition in his work, which had been free of all sectarianism. Speaking of the condition of the people amongst whom his ministry principally lay, he said their greatest enemy was the curse of strong drink. The Sunday services in the Mission Hall, Stanhope-street, were healthy, and the Sunday-schools continued satisfactory. The teachers were most faithful in the discharge of their work, as also in their attendances. During the year mothers' meetings, children's bands of hope, and choir meetings had been inaugurated, and the introduction of the country holiday fund in connection with the Mission was fairly successful, the number of people benefited thereby being forty-five. The Mission was doing a needful and a useful work, and he made an earnest appeal for helpers in Sunday-school work, and also that of visiting. In conclusion, the report dealt with a common fallacy amongst many that the poor should go about in rags and wear a look of dejection upon their faces. People, he thought, should allow a certain amount of pride even amongst the poor. The majority of the poor hid their poverty very often beneath tidy homes.

The Chairman, in moving that the reports and statement of accounts be adopted, thanked the Committee for asking him to preside. He thought they would admit, after the excellent report they had heard, that the Mission had not been lacking in its usefulness. It had been established nearly half a century, and during that time they had had hard-working, energetic, and excellent missionaries, but from the thoughtful and interesting address they had just heard from Mr. Slipper he thought they would all admit that they had rarely one so energetic as that gentleman.

The Rev. Dr. Mellone, in seconding the resolution, said that owing to events during the winter, to which he need not refer, all charities had suffered, and even the hospitals and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children had been anxiously concerned about the falling-off in their subscriptions.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, in reply to a cordial vote of thanks for his services on the previous day, said that he thought there was no more truly Christian work than that done by the excellent Mission, of which they had just heard. He longed to see the work of the domestic missionaries—the work of social elevation of the people, the work of Christian life among the poor done as their missionary was doing it. He asked that the spirit of self-sacrifice which animated many in reference to the present war might be thrown into the work with more grit and more power to endure hardness.

Rev. Douglas Walmsley moved a resolution expressing their interest in the work of the Society, their sympathy with the missionary, Mr. Slipper, and their warm appreciation of the value of Mrs. Slipper's services.

Rev. J. A. Kelly seconded the resolution, and Mr. Slipper responded.

Mr. Alexander Clelland moved, and Rev. W. J. Davies seconded, a resolution thanking the volunteer workers for their assistance during the year, and Dr. Sidney Brice Smyth for the professional care which he freely gave in the service of the sick poor.

A resolution relating to the members of Committee for the coming year was passed, on the motion of Rev. R. J. Orr, seconded by Rev. Alexander Ashworth.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, and the pronouncing of the benediction, concluded the proceedings.

THOMAS PARGETER'S OF FOXCOTE CHARITY,

The trustees of this Charity held their annual meeting (being the thirty-third annual meeting) on the 19th inst., at the offices of Messrs. Harding and Goode, Waterloo-street, Birmingham, when all the trustees were present—namely, the Revs. Henry Eachus, E. D. Priestley Evans, E. P. Hall, B.A., L. P. Jacks, M.A., H. McKean, J. Hardinge Matthews, A. H. Shelley, A. W. Timmis, and Joseph Wood.

The Rev. A. H. Shelley was elected chairman, and the Revs. A. W. Timmis and J. Hardinge Matthews were appointed to act as auditors for the year. Mr. F. H. Jordan was re-elected treasurer. The secretary, Mr. Charles Harding, was also re-elected.

Only two vacancies having occurred during the past year amongst the annuitants, the same were filled up by the election of suitable candidates selected from a very large number of applicants. The number of annuitants on the books of the Charity at the end of the year were 105. Of these, ninety-seven are in receipt of £20 a year each, and eight £16 each—the latter sum being paid in the cases where sisters are annuitants at the same time.

The trustees have been enabled materially to increase the number of annuitants in consequence of liberal gifts which have been made by friends from time to time to the Charity, and also of the annual donation of £100 which has been contributed for some years past anonymously to the funds, and directed to be applied as income. These gifts are expressed to be in recognition of the value of the Charity and its objects, and are an example which it is hoped may be followed by others who are in a position to add further to the funds of the Charity. The number of applicants, however, is still exceedingly large, and is constantly increasing. Applicants must be fifty-five years of age and upwards, and in the selection of annuitants preference is given to those candidates, being otherwise eligible, who have received the education and occupied the position of gentlewomen.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ainsworth.—In connection with the Reading-room and Literary Society, a lecture was given last Wednesday by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, B.A. (of Bury), on "The Shakers," and gave a very interesting account of the opinions, customs, and mode of living, based on a personal visit to their settlement at Shirley, U.S.A. The lecture was well attended. The Rev. J. A. Lauria, M.A. (vicar of Ainsworth), presided.

Ballyhemlin.—During the winter a series of educational lectures to the general public have been given by the Rev. C. Thrift. The attendance has averaged over 200. The concluding lecture was given on Monday evening on "South Africa and the Boers," and was illustrated with many lantern photographs illustrating Boer life and methods of warfare. Patriotic and other songs were rendered by Revs. C. Thrift, R. M. King, and Miss Gray, and selections on the gramophone by Mr. W. P. Allen brought to a close a very successful session.

Birmingham: Fazeley-street Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Monday, March 19, the Lord Mayor presiding. A fuller report of the meeting we are obliged to hold over until next week.

Bradford.—Chapel-lane Chapel, which has been thoroughly renovated and tastefully decorated, was re-opened for public worship last Sunday, and there were large congregations at both services, the edifice being crowded in the evening. The preacher for the day was the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., who discoursed in the morning on "The Value of Religious Worship," and in the evening on "Our Religious Home." The choir of men and boys was ably assisted by Miss Bertha Rigg and Mr. Vincent Ward, whose services greatly enhanced the beauty of the worship. The musical items included Farmer's "Te Deum in D," "God is a Spirit" (Bennett), "Angels ever bright and fair" (Handel), "I waited for the Lord" (Mendelssohn), "In native worth" (Haydn), "Blessed are they" (Sullivan), and "Love Divine" (Stainer). A substantial collection was taken towards the renovation fund.

Brighton (Appointment).—The Rev. H. M. Livens, of Bolton, has accepted an invitation to become minister of Christ Church, in succession to the Rev. Alfred Hood.

Clifton.—The Junior Working Party, which was started last October as a means of uniting the young people of the church in a common undertaking, held a successful sale of work on March 14, the proceedings being opened by Mrs. Roscoe with a few happily chosen remarks. The result was very encouraging, £35 being handed over to the general funds of the church. Mrs. Warschauer, the originator of the enterprise, was presented by the members of the Working Party with a handsome fur rug, in recognition of her efforts. A course of public lectures on "The Evolution of Greek Thought," delivered by Dr. Warschauer, has been attracting good audiences.

Flowery Field, Hyde.—A very successful Bazaar was held on Thursday, Friday and Saturday of last week, to raise £1,500 as a sustentation fund for the church, which was erected by the late Mr. Thomas Ashton. On the first day the bazaar was opened by Mrs. Ashton, the Rev H. E. Dowson in the chair. On the second day the Hon. Mrs. de Beaumont Klein was the opener, Mr. Harry Rawson, J.P., in the chair. Mrs. Klein, who very kindly took the place of her mother, Lady O'Hagan, who was in South Africa, engaged in nursing work in the north of Cape Colony, said that if her mother could have sent a message to them, she was sure that her one word to them all would have been the word of the hour—"Duty." Bazaars might seem to have little to do with the discharge of duty; indeed, they were supposed to be devised as a means of catching people who could not otherwise be caught. If every member of the church did his duty regularly and faithfully in connection with the work of the congregation, no bazaars would be needed, the necessary means would be found without them Yet bazaars had an undoubted value apart from the money raised. They caused people to make more personal efforts, they brought friends together and taught them the divine art of social co-operation. They reminded them of the truth that the life of a religious body is not merely a Sunday affair, but implies a constant contribution of the best of self to the service of others, that service of man which is here below the real measure of the service of God. She had great pleasure in declaring the bazaar open. On Saturday the Mayor of Hyde was the opener, in the absence of Mr. J. F. L. Brunner through illness, the Rev. W. L. Tucker in the chair. The result was a clear £1,000 after paying expenses. The congregation is raising a Twentieth Century Fund of 1,000 crowns, which with a subsequent sale of work in the winter, it is hoped will complete the £1,500 required.

Guildford.—The Ward-street Literary and Debating Society happily pursues its prosperous career. Mr. John Donkin, to whose generous enthusiasm appeal is never made in vain, opened the session, and was followed by Dr. F. Lawson Dodd, who gave an admirable lecture on "The Biglow Papers." Mr. W. R. Skeet, of Woking, gave an antiquarian address of peculiar charm, and the next evening was delightfully devoted to the exhibition of new and original limelight views of South Africa, and many other places, by Mr. Wilson Bristow, of Wandsworth.

Kirkcaldy.—On Wednesday, March 7, a recital was given by Mr. R. C. H. Morrison, as one of the efforts being made to further reduce the debt on the church. There was an attendance of over eighty, and Mr. Morrison's recital, which included selections from Rudyard Kipling, Jerome, R. Buchanan, Ian Maclaren, and other writers, was much appreciated.

Liscard.—The congregation of the Memorial Church have suffered a sad loss in the death of Mr. Harold Johnson, who died on March 12, at the early age of twenty-nine, and was cremated on the following Friday, the service being conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. Mr. Johnson, who was the son of Mrs. Emily Johnson, one of the staunchest members of the congregation, had been for some years in Canada, but since his return home have thrown himself heartily into the work of the church, and at the time of his death was secretary of the Wednesday Evening Society. Failing health and the prospect of early death he faced with manly quietness. The deepest sympathy is felt for Mrs. Johnson and her surviving children.

London: Hackney.—On Friday, 16th inst., a meeting of the congregation of the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, was held in the schoolrooms adjoining the church, to receive the annual report of the Committee and accounts for the past year. The treasurer, Mr. A. T. Collier, who presided, congratulated the congregation on the appointment of their new minister, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, and the satisfactory condition of the various institutions connected with the church. Subsequently the annual reports of the Sunday-school and Friendly Society were also presented.

London: Highgate.—A large party of friends from neighbouring churches assembled at Highgate on Thursday evening of last week. The occasion was twofold—firstly, to afford an opportunity of meeting the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, the newly-appointed minister, and secondly, by way of a revival of the united social gatherings of the members of the various North London Unitarian Churches. The large schoolroom was well filled, nearly 200 persons being present. Amongst the visitors were the Revs. Dr. Mummery, Dr. Hicks, W. Copeland Bowie, T. E. M. Edwards, W. Wooding, Dr. Odgers, Mrs. Bayle Bernard, Miss Tagart, Miss Teschemacher, Messrs. J. T. Preston, Mackey, Sudbery, and others. After the reception of the guests, adjournment was made to the church, where a few short speeches were given. Mr. Withall, the church treasurer, in explaining the purpose of the meeting, said that to their own congregation the past year had been one of considerable anxiety. It was only a few weeks since they had in their own quiet way celebrated the first anniversary of the death of their late revered pastor, the Rev. R. Spears, and it was only a few months ago that they had erected to his memory the marble tablet placed on the church wall. That tablet it was hoped would serve, not only to remind them of the unbounded enthusiasm of their late minister in a great cause—the cause of a pure and simple religion—but also as an incentive to generations yet to come. The death of Mr. Spears had created a blank not only in their own church, but in the religious life of the world. As regards themselves it was their duty to find a successor, and they had invited the Rev. J. T. Sunderland to come over from America and minister to them. This he had consented to do, at least for a time, and that evening they had the pleasure of according to Mr. Sunderland a hearty and united welcome.

The Rev. J. T. Sunderland said that he must first of all thank everyone present for their cordial greetings. Whether his stay at Highgate be long or short it was premature to say, but he felt sure that evening that he had laid the foundation of many friendships. He was glad to have the opportunity of working in London. As one who had looked at London from afar off for many years he could say that the influence of their city for good or for ill was felt all over the world. In matters of religion London should take the lead, and their own beautiful faith ought to be nowhere more strongly rooted than in the great metropolis of the world. He would, therefore, count it an honour to have some share in their work. As to the meeting that evening he could not speak too highly of the importance of such united gatherings on the part of churches. Although justly proud of their religious independence, Unitarians must not be too independent socially; they must bind themselves together, they must extend the hand of fellowship from church to church, and the best way of doing so was by means of such meetings in which they were then taking part. The Rev. W. C. Bowie said he felt sure that Mr. Sunderland could not have been more fortunate than in coming to Highgate. They had there a church in which were a number of earnest men—men who worked for their church, and that was a great thing. It happened not infrequently that the ladies of a congregation formed the dominant power; but he was pleased to think that at Highgate some of the staunchest workers were of his own sex, who would give to their minister a ready and resolute assistance. During the evening organ recitals were given by Mr. Williams, and songs were contributed by Miss Teasdale and Mr. Rush, and light refreshments were served.

London: Islington.—On Tuesday evening Dr. G. D. Hicks delivered the last of his lectures on the "Kantian Philosophy," the series having been extended from six to nine lectures, in order that the subject might be properly unfolded. Several visitors were present, besides the usual members of his class. The heartiest applause greeted the lecturer as he resumed his seat. At the close of the usual interval for conversation, a formal vote of thanks was moved to Dr. Hicks for the able and thorough manner in which he had discharged his voluntary task, and was carried in the warmest manner after being supported by various members. It is earnestly to be hoped that these lectures may reach a larger public in a more permanent form. As one of the speakers remarked, the study of philosophy which he had been led into had removed many mental difficulties he had long experienced, and while it had swept away many old conceptions, it had for him established the foundation of faith upon a surer basis.

London: Stamford-street.—On Monday last the chapel was filled to overflowing with friends and neighbours, on the occasion of the marriage of Miss Clara Brooker, who has been connected with the congregation from childhood, and is deservedly popular as an active and zealous worker at Stamford-street. The chapel was beautifully decorated with arum lilies, spiræa, ferns and other plants and flowers, the service being conducted by the Rev. Frederic Allen, by whom an appropriate address was given. On the previous day, at the conclusion of the afternoon school, Mr. Allen, on behalf of a large number of subscribers, presented Miss Brooker with a very handsome silver-plated tea and coffee service on an oak tray, accompanied by an address of appreciation and good wishes. Short speeches were given by Messrs. F. Welch, W. H. Abraham, and S. Kirby, expressing the indebtedness of all, and Miss Brooker gave her sincere thanks to all for their kindness to her. A hymn and the benediction closed the proceedings. In the morning of Sunday a presentation was made by the 1st Company of the Boys' Own Brigade to the Rev. Frederic Allen, consisting of an illuminated address (signed by all the members of the company) and an ebony stick with an inscription thereon, in recognition of the interest taken and services rendered by him as chaplain to the company. Mr. J. C. Ballantyne (captain) presented the gifts on behalf of the boys, and Mr. Allen, in replying, thanked all very heartily for their great kindness to him.

Lye.—On Sunday evening, March 11, a tablet to the memory of the late Mr. Charles Cochrane, which has been placed in the chapel, was unveiled. The tablet is of white marble, and bears the following inscription:—"In memory of Charles Cochrane, justice of the peace; born May 3rd, 1835; died May 11th, 1898. True in spirit, earnest of purpose, pure in heart, a worthy benefactor of this church." Service was conducted by Rev. I. Wrigley, who preached from the words: "Righteousness is immortal," and spoke of Mr. Cochrane's noble character, his great generosity and genuine modesty, his earnestness of purpose and loyalty to conviction. Mr. A. W. Worthington, J.P. of Stourbridge, also gave an address, in which he referred to the fearlessness with which Mr. Cochrane had identified himself with an unpopular faith, and the great indebtedness of that congregation to his munificent kindness. Mr. Worthington then unveiled the tablet and read the inscription. Mr. Jeremiah Pardoe and Mr. Wrigley expressed the thanks of the congregation to Mr. Worthington. In the course of the service, "O Rest in the Lord" was sung.

Manchester: Strangeways.—In connection with the Guild, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, recently visited the school and lectured on "The Holy Land in the Present Day." The lecture was of a most interesting character, and was illustrated with nearly a hundred beautiful lantern pictures taken by the lecturer. The Rev. Charles Peach also paid us a visit the other Sunday afternoon and told us all about the Great Hucklow country and its attractions, and the proposed new Holiday Home for the Sunday Schools of the Manchester District Association. Many interesting lantern pictures were shown, and a collection was made for the funds of the Holiday Home.

Manchester: United Devotional Service.—A special service under the auspices of the M.D.A.P.U. Churches, the second held this winter for the congregations in and about Manchester, was held in Cross-street Chapel, on Tuesday evening, March 13. The attendance was an improvement on that of the earlier meeting, and of a character to encourage the efforts of the Devotional Service Committee. It was a great pleasure to hear again the earnest tones of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal's voice as he led the devotions, and the direct, simple and beautiful address of the Rev. J. Byles, whose subject was "The Face of Jesus Christ," will be remembered for a long time. The Monton Church choir led the singing.

Todmorden.—An announcement of the opening of the extended school buildings by Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Bart., M.P., on March 31, will be found in our advertisement columns. The cost of the alterations has been £1,500, and the school premises are now among the largest and best adapted to their purpose in the denomination.

Walthamstow.—The Sunday-school has now been in existence a little over two years, and special anniversary services were held on Sunday last. Mr. Charles A. Ginever conducted the morning service, and in the afternoon the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, addressed a good gathering, over ninety children and between thirty and forty adults being present. In the evening the Rev. Frederic Allen, of Stamford-street Chapel, preached to a congregation of over a hundred, the majority being adults, and but for the very inclement weather many more persons would have been present. The special hymns, chant and anthem, "Forward be our Watchword," were heartily sung, and the instructive and interesting addresses were listened to most attentively by children and adults, and much enjoyed.

Further donations should be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Chairman, Indian Subcommittee, Essex Hall, Essex-street, London, W.C.

THE work of writing the life of Dr. Martineau has been entrusted by his children to Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, and Professor Upton, who were fellow-students in the College, and for the last twenty-five years have been intimately associated together as teachers on its staff. As old students of Dr. Martineau's, and afterwards for so many years his colleagues, Dr. Drummond and Mr. Upton are eminently fitted for their task. The record and interpretation of Dr. Martineau's philosophy will naturally be Mr. Upton's share of the work, he having succeeded to Dr. Martineau's chair in Manchester College, and having long enjoyed the privilege of the most intimate converse with his former teacher on those high themes. No one could have a deeper sense of the sacredness of the trust placed in their hands than these two friends and disciples of our great teacher, and by no one could we hope that it would be more earnestly and reverently fulfilled.

THE first article in the March number of the New World is a warmly appreciative account of Dr. Martineau, by the Rev. A. W. Jackson, of Concord, whose "Study of the Life and Work of Dr. Martineau," a book on which he has been engaged for many years, is now in the press. The article in the New World is written with knowledge as well as enthusiasm, but it was on Jan. 11, not on the 12th, that Dr. Martineau passed away, and Mr. Jackson cannot have heard of the death of Mrs. Leyson Lewis, or he would not have said, having referred to the boy Herbert, that "five other children survive him."

THE Special Services Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have arranged with the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., LL.D., to preach at the Unitarian Church, East Hill, Wandsworth, on Sunday morning, April 8, and at Essex Church, The Mall, Kensington, on six Sunday mornings, from May 27 to July 1 inclusive. We are glad to learn that Mr. Brooke is again restored to health. His course of six lectures on the poetry of Robert Browning at University College, London, will begin on Thursday evening, May 3.

THE Programme of the National Conference at Leicester announces two meetings not strictly belonging to the Conference. The meeting on Tuesday afternoon of "Ministerial Fellowship" is only for the ministers concerned; but on Thursday afternoon there is to be a meeting of the Essex Hall Temperance Association in the Lecture Hall, to consider Lord Peel's "Report of the Royal Commission on Licensing." The Revs. R. A. Armstrong, Dr. Drummond, S. A. Steinthal, J. T. Sunderland, W. C. Pope, J. C. Street, C. J. Street and F. Allen are announced as to be present and take part in the proceedings.

THE recollection of what has taken place at former meetings of the Conference leads us to make the following suggestions in view of the devotional services with which each morning at Leicester will begin :—That friends should not forget the hour at which these services begin, that those who wish to take part in them should be in their places in good time and in quietness, that people should not come straggling in while the service is going on, and that those who are assembling outside during the half-hour of the service should refrain from loud conversation just outside the doors. These morning services are a great opportunity easily marred by a little carelessness, and we would beg that this may be earnestly borne in mind.

WE publish in our present issue two letters, one from a well-known layman, the other from an equally well-known minister, with reference to a suggestion made last week by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, as to a possible resolution to be offered to the Conference on the subject of the coming settlement in South Africa. We should have been thankful if it had been possible for the Conference, as representing the body of our churches throughout the country, to make a clear and strong pronouncement on this subject, but we are not aware that notice of any such resolution has been given, and we do not suppose that the President would allow the discussion of any resolution of which due notice had not been given.

WE announced last week that there will be a bookstall at the Leicester Conference, under the charge of Mr. Hare, of Essex Hall, at which the most recent publications of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday-school Association will be on sale, and also a number of other books of liberal religion both English and American. Among the publications of the B. and F.U.A. will be found a re-issue of Charles Perry's "Spiritual Perspective," which we specially commend to Postal Mission workers; Mr. Armstrong's "Back to Jesus"; Mr. Wicksteed's Essex Hall Lecture, "The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity," and the Essex Hall Year Book; The S.S.A. will offer "The Helper" for 1900; Mr. Tarrant's "Our Faith"; Miss F. E. Cooke's "Story of J. G. Whittier," which has come opportunely for this Conference, as her charming little biography of Dorothea Dix came for the Sheffield Conference; a cheap edition, at 1s. net, of Miss Gertrude Martineau's "Outline Lessons on Morals," and a little book of "Addresses to Children," selected from the Children's Column of The Inquirer. Among other publications will be found Dr. Sadler's "Sermons for Children"; Mr. Byles's "Legend of St. Mark"; Mr. Walter Lloyd's "Story of Protestant Dissent and English Unitarianism"; Mr. Armstrong's "Martineau's Study of Religion," which is noticed in our present issue; Dr. Drummond's "Epistles of St. Paul." And of American books, Dr. M. J. Savage's "Life Beyond Death," and "Our Unitarian Gospel"; Mr. C.F.Dole's "The Theology of Civilisation," &c. We may also add that there will be some remaining copies of The Inquirer's special Martineau Memorial number on sale.

The Literary Year Book and Bookman's Directory, for 1900, published by Mr. George Allen (price 3s. 6d.), is full of information serviceable not only to those who are practically engaged in literary pursuits, but to all who are interested in books and their authors. It contains a directory of authors, with names and addresses and mention of the books published during 1899 (with some others), including nearly 3,000 names and occupying over 100 pages. There are also lists of artists, publishers, booksellers, bookbinders, periodical publications, &c., and useful information as to copyright, the correction of proofs and other mysteries. The list of libraries includes a good account of the British Museum reading-room and the conditions of its use. The Obituary and the "Events of the Year" run from February, 1899, to the end of January, 1900, so that the former includes the names of Martineau and Ruskin. The calendar includes a large number of names and dates of authors, but it is puzzling to find two entries close together—"Nov. 15, Cowper b. 1731," "Nov. 26, Cowper b. 1631"—and for the present year it would have been well also to note on April 25, Cowper d. 1800. There is a selection of critical notices, which seem out of proportion, if not out of place, in such a volume. From a sketch of the year's work we learn that in 1899 as many as 7,567 books were published.

Present Day Papers, edited by J. Wilhelm Rowntree (Headley Bros. 6d. net), is a monthly issue by members of the Society of Friends, containing articles which we are glad to commend to our readers. The February number contains an article by M. Catharine Albright on "Meetings for Worship," and a short article by Miss F. E. Cooke on "William Penn." The March number contains an article by Mr. J. W. Graham, Principal of Dalton Hall, Manchester, on "Ruskin and Quakerism," and an article on "Self-Realisation," by Henry B. Binns.

Mr. A. J. Mundella, the secretary of the National Education Association, points [illegible] the Education Code for 1900, which will become law in a few days, unless it is successfully opposed, strikes a disastrous blow at the "higher grade" elementary schools. The special grants for "specific" subjects are abolished, the ordinary education grant is withheld from most of the children over fourteen years of age, and the maximum amount obtainable by schools for boys is reduced. These reductions are made under cover of a reform which substitutes a single (or "block") grant for the six or eight miscellaneous grants previously offered. The substitution of one grant for many may be a desirable educational reform, if it be provided, as in the Scotch code, in such a way as to encourage advanced teaching. But in the block grant now proposed for England and Wales, advanced teaching is discouraged, and much of the grant which now maintains it will be abolished. The friends of educational progress should use their influence to obtain a revision or rejection of these reactionary proposals.

The Unitarian congregation at Sydney, New South Wales, are anxious to discover an able, earnest, devoted young minister prepared to undertake the work of preacher and pastor of their church. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, is in a position to supply information to any minister who would like to go out to Australia.

London Unitarian Bazaar.—The Executive Committee have decided to end the Bazaar week with a dance and conversazione to be held on Saturday, May 5, at the Holborn Restaurant. The dance is to be a Cinderella, from 7.45 p.m. precisely, and is to be held in the King's Hall, the conversazione being in the Crown Room. The price of tickets for the dance and conversazione is to be 5s. each, including refreshments. The Committee appeal to all loyal friends of the movement to take tickets for themselves and to induce others to do the same. It would greatly facilitate arrangements if those who desire tickets would apply as soon as possible. Tickets can be obtained from either of the undersigned:—F. PRIVATE BAPTISM.

"Just in time! ah! God is good,
For the infant died as I marked his brow
With the blessed sign of the Holy Rood,
And his spirit is with the angels now."

Just in time! And suppose you late—
Not every parson could run that race;
Were the infant damned?—
"We leave his fate
To God's uncovenanted grace."

Dare you to tell me, Reverend Friend,
Heaven's crowns hung on your vestry pegs?
And the covenant mercies of God depend
On the length and strength of a parson's legs?

THE LEICESTER CONFERENCE.

Sir,—I am one of those who thankfully accept your decision to close the correspondence which has lately occupied so much of your space.

But, in view of our closely approaching Conference, it must be apparent to your readers that a passage in our good friend, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers's letter touches the position of those who attend that Conference very nearly indeed.

I would suggest that he may have overlooked the fact that we really go to Leicester, and speak and vote there, as representatives of congregations, and not as individuals. A definite programme, too, has been drawn up and published by the Committee, and delegates elected for the discharge of that programme. I would submit that we have no mandate to speak, or to vote, on matters outside the already specified business of the Conference. Our congregations have not deputed us to act as their political spokesmen.

Even if our friends convened a separate meeting at Leicester on matters beyond the authorised programme, it is but right to remember that the general public would not be alive to the distinction, whilst such action would certainly savour of an attempt to fasten on the Conference expressions of opinion which the Conference had had no opportunity of adopting, or rejecting.

Ambrose N. Blatchford.

March 26.

Sir,—I have read with much interest the letter of Rev. J. Collins Odgers in your journal of the 24th inst. He says: "Is it not possible for us with more united voice to accept some resolution against the threatened total extinction of two little free nations?" and he adds, "What shall we do at Leicester?"

Surely it will be better not to discuss the Boer question at the Leicester meeting? The gathering at Leicester is a representative one. Ministers and delegates go there to represent their congregations at meetings where certain topics already announced will be discussed. These topics have been declared for more than three weeks, and I believe delegates have been appointed since. The programme has been carefully prepared by the Committee, and I submit these delegates have no right to represent their congregations on any other topics newly added to the programme at the eleventh hour.

No man can ever go forward to a higher belief until he is true to the faith which he already holds. Be the noblest man that your present faith, poor, weak, and imperfect as it is, can make you to be. Live up to your present growth, your present faith. So and so only, as you take the next step straight forward, as you stand where you now are, so only can you think the curtain will draw back, and there will be revealed to you what lies beyond.—Phillips Brooks.

THE MIRACLES OF THE PERSIAN BAB.

IN a former article I compared the Transfiguration of Ali Muhammad the Bab, as it is narrated by an eyewitness of the occurrence, with the Transfiguration of Jesus as it is described in the Gospels, and the conclusion to which I was led was that, notwithstanding the ecclesiastical bearing of the Gospel narrative and the obviously figurative character of the detailed story, yet, judging by analogy, there was in all probability some real event either physical or mental or both, some fact or some illusion, which originally gave rise to the narrative and which was afterwards added to and improved into that parabolic shape which has come down to us.

I think I may say that the general result of studying the rise of the Babi religion—that remarkable Oriental religion which has arisen in our own time—is to lead one away from the purely mythical position, and to convince the student that in the rise of Christianity also the stories of miracles, even the most figurative and poetic, generally arose from veritable incidents which occurred in the life of Jesus.

Passing by the legends of the cradle and the school, which are of no great significance, the first miracle we meet with in the Life of the Bab is the Healing of the Chief Constable's son at Shiraz. The Bab, immediately after his "Manifestation," made the pilgrimage to Mecca; on his return thence, lingered for a short time at the port of Bushire, and then went back to his native town of Shiraz. There, by the influence of the clergy who throughout his ministry bitterly opposed him, he was imprisoned for six months. At the end of that time a pestilence appeared in the town, and the son of the chief constable "fell sick and came nigh to death's door." Whereupon "Abdu'l-Hamid (the chief constable) besought the Bab, who prayed for him and he recovered. When Abdu'l Khan beheld such evidence of spiritual power, he believed, and said to the Bab: "Depart whithersoever your holy inclinations may lead you, and I, so far from hindering you, will assist you in every way that lies in my power." And so the Bab escaped from the prison at Shiraz and fled to the more friendly town of Isfahan.

The miracle falls, perhaps, under the fallacy of post hoc, ergo propter hoc, to which it is possible that certain of the Gospel miracles in which the healer came into no personal contact with the healed also belong; but my point is that whether we take that view, or hold that even in these cases faith had its healing function, in all probability a real incident nearly always lies behind the narrative, and we ought not rashly to join those critics who seek to dissolve them away into pure myth or allegory.

The next miracle follows immediately after this of the Chief Constable's son and has a curious parallel in the Gospel story.

When the Bab found that he was free, he called his disciple Aka Muhammad Huseyn, "and gave him fifty tumans, saying, 'Go to the market-place, and there buy three horses with such-and-such marks and distinctive qualities; and when you have bought them, take them to the Mausoleum of Hafiz, and bring word to me.'" The history goes on to narrate how the disciple went to the market-place, and to his amazement found a man with three horses exactly such as had been described, and the price of which was exactly fifty tumans.

The incident is magnified by the Babi historian into a miracle, but it is sufficiently obvious that the whole affair was merely a prudent pre-arrangement, and that nothing was further from the Bab's mind than the working of any sign or wonder. It belongs to a class of miracles of which we have a somewhat similar instance in the Gospel story: I mean the sending of the disciples into the village to find the colt "whereon no man ever yet sat." I well remember in my childhood being taught that Christ's knowledge that the colt would be found tied there, and that the owner would address his query to the disciples and be satisfied with the reply which Jesus put into their mouth—that all this was a proof of supernatural knowledge, and formed a manifest miracle; and in the older commentators that view may still be read.

On this journey, from Shiraz to Isfahan, occurred the miracle of the Transfiguration, upon which I have previously commented. At Isfahan the Bab was received in a friendly way by the good Governor, Minuchihr Khan, and concealed by him for four months in his own palace. At the end of that time the Governor died, his death having been foretold by the Bab nineteen days before its occurrence. Another prediction which he made at about this time was of disaster which should happen to the Deputy-Governor, who was unfriendly to the Bab—a prediction which was sometime afterwards fulfilled. Many prophecies of this kind are narrated in the story of his ministry, but they are mostly sufficiently transparent, the prediction being of a general nature, and the fulfilment being such as only wonder-loving Easterns would regard as having any supernatural significance.

After the death of the friendly Governor of Isfahan, the Bab was betrayed by the Deputy-Governor, and secretly sent to the capital. On the way he was permitted to stay for a night at the house of two believing brothers in Kashan, and there a curious miracle occurred, of which we have two instances in the Babi history, but no parallel, I think, in the New Testament—the temporary deprival suffered by learned people in the presence of the Bab of all control over their learning.* The one case can, I think, be explained from physical causes; in the other the essential details are obscure.

Arrived at Teheran, the young prophet was not permitted to have an audience with the Shah, but was immediately placed under a guard of soldiers, and conducted first to Tabriz, a journey of 300 miles, and thence to the fortress of Maku. Throughout the whole of this journey intense excitement and enthusiasm was exhibited on the part of the populace. The soldiers who held him in custody sold threads of his garments, and drops of the water he had washed in to the general public, such things being regarded as charms with healing virtue. The atmosphere is just such as we find indicated in the Gospels, when "they laid the sick in the market-places, and besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment: and as many as touched him were made whole."

In such emotional surroundings it is not surprising that numerous miracles were worked. The door of the room in which the Bab had been imprisoned unlocked of its own accord (cf. Acts xii. 10); a soldier who attempted to use force to him was seized with dreadful cramps; a letter was answered before it was read or even opened; the horse on which the Bab rode, though it was the leanest and sorriest jade that could be found, was never tired and outstripped all the rest; and so forth. Perhaps one of the most notable miracles performed upon this journey was the healing of a leprous child, "whose head was so covered with scabs that it was white down to the neck." The guards would have forbidden her to approach, "but His Holiness prevented them, and called the child to him. Then he drew a handkerchief over its head and repeated certain words; which he had no sooner done than the child was healed. And in that place about two hundred persons believed and underwent a true and sincere conversion."*

I have taken pains to ascertain from medical men of standing whether faith on the part of the patient could effect such a cure, and the verdict seems to be that the causative chain between mind and nerve, nerve and blood-vessel, blood-vessel and circulation, circulation and skin-condition, is such that it is just possible some kinds of skin-disease might be affected by mental process, but certainly not cured with this alleged rapidity. However this may be, whether it was a case of faith-healing or one of the many cases of post hoc, there cannot, I think, be a doubt that the incident narrated in the "Tarikh-i-Jadid" is historical. May not, then, the leper-cure of Mark i. 40-42 be also historical, the "straightway" being in both cases a very natural exaggeration?

Shortly after this, and on the same journey, a case of fever was cured by drinking tea from the Bab's cup. In this case the patient was an enthusiastic believer, of whom the Bab had desired a certain service, which the disciple was prevented from undertaking by his illness; and it is easy enough to understand how such a man might by such means have recovered, sufficiently at any rate to be able to go upon the errand which his master required of him.

On the last stage of this journey to Maku, while the Bab was resting at Tabriz, another miracle of healing occurred which recalls a somewhat similar miracle recorded in the New Testament.

The Bab was taking his afternoon tea in a garden adjoining the house where he was confined, when

One Mash-hadi Ali by name entered the garden in a state of great trouble, saying, "Three of my family are sick, and I despair of the lives of two of them, since there is no hope of their being restored to health; but the third, whose recovery appears possible, I pray you to heal." "Be of good cheer," answered His Holiness, "all three will get well." After a while the man departed, but next morning he came to me, saying, "On arriving at my house I beheld all three sitting up in perfect health, as though they had never been ill." This man became a sincere believer, and was converted, and set himself to perform humble and devoted service.

* "The Tarikh-i-Jadid." Translated by E. G. Browne, pp. 36, 215

The story reminds us forcibly of the healing of the Centurion's son, and it should serve as a check upon the tendency shown by some critics to make a selection of the healing-miracle, eliminating as unhistorical those in which the patient was at a distance when the miracle was performed. However, we may explain the occurrence, and explanations no doubt are possible, that the incident occurred as narrated cannot reasonably be doubted. The story is given in the "Tarikh-i-Jadid," on the authority of Muhammad Ali the Martyr, a constant attendant upon the Bab, and an eye and ear witness of the event in question.

During the imprisonment of the Bab at Maku and at Chirik the miracles appear to have ceased; but the miraculous re-appears after his death, for it was as impossible for the followers of the Bab as it was for the followers of Christ to believe that God would "suffer His Holy One to see corruption," and we read how when the bodies of the Bab and his favourite disciple which had been cast into the moat were at length removed and taken to a distant place to be buried, "several persons charged with the transfer and burial of the bodies, on proceeding to the place where they lay, saw that absolutely no change had taken place in them, but that they were still perfectly sweet and fresh, as though they had fallen asleep. One or two of those entrusted with their removal were so overcome with fear and astonishment at this sight that for some time they suffered from an acute fever."

Several other more or less trivial miracles are narrated elsewhere of the Bab, as for instance the conversion of a metal pipe-cover into gold at his touch, and the production of a purse of gold when demanded of him by thieving soldiers, although it was well known to his disciples that he had no money (compare Peter's fish and piece of money); but those which I have given above, taken from the "Tarikh-i-Jadid" are at once the most typical and the best attested.

Such signs and wonders spring from many causes. Sometimes from coincidence, sometimes from malobservation, sometimes from the after-exaggeration of disciples, sometimes (perhaps) from the misunderstanding of figurative language, though I repeat that on the whole the effect of a perusal of the Babi histories is to convince me that less stress must be laid upon this last-named source of miracle-stories than has sometimes been done. As to the wonders of healing, I am convinced that when allowance has been made for all such sources of error, a certain residuum remains — a wonderful healing power manifest in Jesus, manifest also in the Bab, referable in both cases to obscure but perfectly natural psychical powers.

One thing, in conclusion, I must in justice to the Bab explain. Like Jesus of Nazareth, he cared little for miracles. Mulla Mirza Muhammad, one of his earliest disciples, compiled a bookful of miracles worked by the Bab and his disciples, but found, when he had completed his task, that the Bab in nowise regarded these wonders as a proof of his mission, and did not wish the account of them to be published; whereupon he destroyed the book. Only one miracle the Bab regarded as evidence of his divine mission, the miracle (as he regarded it) of his own inspiration; and this leads one to believe that by far the greater number of his miracles (as also, surely, of the miracles of Jesus) were created by the minds of the disciples, not by the will of their Master. LITERATURE.

THROUGH NATURE TO GOD.*

We have received two recently published works by Professor Fiske, the smaller of which is an important appendix to his well-known books "The Idea of God" and "The Destiny of Man," and the larger a miscellaneous collection of essays.

"Through Nature to God" is a title which might be given to the trilogy of which this is the conclusion. Although intelligible by itself, this third part will hardly find its full significance unless the reader is already familiar with its forerunners. It consists of three papers, whose titles serve to show the grave nature of their theme—"The Mystery of Evil," "The Cosmic Roots of Love and Self-Sacrifice," "The Everlasting Reality of Religion." They are intended to round off into a certain completeness Fiske's restatement of natural religion in the light of evolution.

"The Mystery of Evil" is designed, we are told, to supply some considerations which, for the sake of conciseness, were omitted from "The Idea of God." The constructive portion of this essay depends on the proposition which stands at the head of Part VI., "Without the Element of Antagonism there could be no Consciousness, and therefore no World." If this be so, without the contrasting conscious states of pain and sin there could be no joy or goodness. We are called on to observe that progress is brought about in Nature first by choice of joy instead of pain, secondly by the choice of ethical good instead of ethical evil.

"Moral evil is simply the characteristic of the lower state of living as looked at from the higher state." "In the process of spiritual evolution, therefore, evil must needs be present. But the nature of evolution also requires that it should be evanescent. In the higher stages that which is worse than the best need no longer be positively bad." "Unless our eyes had been opened . . . so that we might come to know the good and the evil, we should never have become fashioned in God's image."

It would be unreasonable to ask, in these regions of thought, for strict demonstration. All that can be looked for is some suggestion by which reason may be brought to the aid of faith. Faith may certainly find encouragement here, not only in the central idea, which is developed with lucid phrase and vivid simile, but also in the contagion of the writer's own faith. But there are flaws in the logical texture of the argument.

Now and again a looseness of expression, not in itself reprehensible, but ill-suited to such a theme, offends the attentive reader. "If an individual antelope falls below the average of the herd in speed, he is sure to become food for lions." Were this true, there would soon be but one fixed rate of speed for antelopes, and probably but one antelope to possess it. "Morality comes upon the scene when there is an alternative of leading better lives or worse lives." Logic forbids that the words "better" and "worse" should have here a moral colour, but Professor Fiske has not in any exact way defined the sense in which he uses them. So he speaks—on the same page, and again in the passage quoted above—of "higher" and "lower" states of living, without precise statement of what is meant by "high" and "low."

These faults are only incidental, and can easily be repaired. There is, however, a serious difficulty inherent in the very nature of his argument, which Mr. Fiske has not been at pains to detect and solve. If it be true that good and evil are merely relative, and exist but by contrast, so that "in a happy world there must be sorrow and pain, and in a moral world the knowledge of evil is indispensable," how can it also be true that evil is evanescent? States, stages, kinds, degrees of evil may disappear and be succeeded by others, but if evil itself should disappear it can only be by the simultaneous annihilation of goodness. The world can only cease to be moral plus immoral by becoming non-moral—by the destruction or absorption of the ethical idea. Upon this hypothesis "the final triumph of righteousness" and "the final triumph of unrighteousness" become synonymous, since each entails the utter destruction of both combatants.

But is it true that good cannot be without evil? Professor Fiske says: "The alternative is clear—on the one hand a world with sin and suffering, on the other hand an unthinkable world in which conscious life does not involve contrast." But this is not an exclusive alternative. There is room for a world in which all men are good and happy, and conscious of their goodness and happiness by dint of conceiving badness and unhappiness, which yet do not, except in idea, exist in that world. Professor Fiske hopes for a time when "the fact of evil will lapse into a mere memory, in which the shadowed past shall serve as a background for the realised glory of the present." If such a time, when evil is but a monster of the imagination, be possible, the actual existence of evil has still to be justified. I say "justified" rather than "explained," for I believe that the mystery of evil more often presents itself as the problem of pain than as the problem of sin. It is, moreover, in this form that it exhibits the greater obstinacy towards Professor Fiske's solution, and distresses the theist with an ethical difficulty. Are we to say that in a company where all are glad, and none has any thought of misery in his mind, none are glad? Surely joy as a state of consciousness may exist without the reflection "I am joyful," which implies the complementary concept of misery. But if not, a good man would rather forego his joy than purchase it at the cost of another's misery; we would destroy misery if we could. The problem is that God does not destroy it. We feel that it is necessary to "justify the ways of God to man," and as a justification of pain this essay seems incomplete.

The second paper supports, in opposition to Huxley's declaration that the "cosmic process has no sort of relation to moral ends," the thesis that "the cosmic process exists purely for the sake of moral ends." Professor Fiske's position is not, however, so flatly contradictory to Huxley's as the words seem to show. The later writer is using the term "cosmic process" in a more extended sense. Huxley meant that natural selection is so far from being an ethical process that it shocks our ethical sensibilities. It is no contradiction of this undoubted fact to urge that our ethical sensibilities and conceptions have themselves been evolved in a process of which one stage was natural selection. There is nothing original in the main argument of this paper. It begins with A. R. Wallace's discovery of the new stage in organic evolution when variations of intelligence began to be more profitable to one of the higher primates than variations in body. It proceeds, without mentioning Professor Clifford, to expound his theory that the function of conscience is the preservation of the race as a race. It dwells on the altruistic institution of maternity, which is called "the derivative source from which all other kinds" of altruism "were by slow degrees developed," and takes occasion to speak of the author's "own special contribution to the Doctrine of Evolution"—namely, the part played in the genesis of the human race by the lengthening of infancy. (One of the Essays in "A Century of Science" is also devoted to this head.) The matter and moral are, in fact, those of Henry Drummond's "Ascent of Man," given with neater workmanship in smaller compass. It need hardly be recalled how much Professor Drummond owed, in the shaping of his theory, to Fiske's earlier works.

* "Through Nature to God." By John Fiske. Macmillan and Co. 1899.
"A Century of Science and other Essays." By John Fiske. Macmillan and Co. 1899.

The third paper is an admirably displayed chain of reasoning to show that there is a scientific balance of probability in favour of the truth of the central postulates of religion. Professor Fiske speaks of three—a God with a human element in Him, human immortality, the ethical significance of the unseen world—but this analysis of the religious instinct is independent of the course of his argument, and may be amended, if the reader will, without affecting his conclusion. Taking the response to external stimuli as the most fundamental characteristic of living things, the essayist shows how evolution, in terms of this characteristic, is made up of successive adjustments of "inner relations" to "outer relations." The "inner adjustment" has always been an adjustment to an external reality. Now we have already co-ordinated the development of conscience and the religious instinct with, say, the modification of a pectoral fin into a wing or fore-leg, as a step in organic evolution. The original, and, it seems to me, brilliant and sound corollary is added that this adjustment also is an adjustment to an external reality.

So far as our knowledge of Nature goes the whole momentum of it carries us onward to the conclusion that the Unseen World, as the objective term in a relation of fundamental importance that has coexisted with the whole career of mankind, has a real existence; and it is but following out the analogy to regard that Unseen World as the theatre where the ethical process is destined to reach its full consummation.

Among the collected essays the most notable are that which gives the book its title, a short survey of science during the nineteenth century; an address on "The Scope and Purport of Evolution," which assigns their several trophies to several prominent workers, and contests Haeckel's proposition that evolution has an atheistic tendency; a speech on "The Part played by Infancy in the Evolution of Man"; an interesting sketch of "The Origins of Liberal Thought in America"; two pleasant chapters on "The Bacon-Shakespeare Folly" and "Some Cranks and their Crotchets," and eight other pieces, four of which are biographical. Together they make a book with a character of its own, whose acquaintance one may be pleased to make, and to refresh with occasional visits.

AN INTRODUCTION TO MARTINEAU'S "STUDY OF RELIGION."*

The second of Messrs. James Clarke and Co.'s "Small Books on Great Subjects" was Dr. Martineau's "Faith the Beginning, Self-Surrender the Fulfilment, of the Spiritual Life," containing four of his sermons, published in 1897; and it was a happy thought to add to the same series this little book of Mr. Armstrong's, in which are reprinted the articles contributed by him to The Inquirer, from Jan. 14 to March 3, 1888, giving "a brief analysis and exposition" of Dr. Martineau's "Study of Religion," then just published.

The articles are reprinted, with such slight alterations as the lapse of time and the death of Dr. Martineau rendered necessary, and to the seventh chapter on "Pitfalls of Philosophy" Mr. Armstrong has added an interesting note on the implications of Fore-Knowledge and Free-Will.

Of the three great works, in which Dr. Martineau summed up the thought and study of his life—namely, "Types of Ethical Theory" (1885), "A Study of Religion" (1888), and "The Seat of Authority in Religion" (1890)—Mr. Armstrong writes in his Preface:—

> Each work is unique in its kind. The first is the most powerful and competent reply that has been made to the advocates of the Utilitarian and Determinist theories of morals. The second takes up the ethical position of the first and extends it to a vindication of Theistic belief incomparable, in my view, in force and scope. The third combines with a restatement of the grounds of Theism, the most trenchant criticism in literature of the Roman Catholic and Protestant positions, and an examination of the original documents of Christianity abreast of the most advanced Continental scholarship.

To religious inquirers at a certain stage, probably the most illuminating and helpful of all Martineau's writings is "The Seat of Authority," and it is less weighted with the technical language of philosophy than the "Types" or the "Study." But it has not the concentrated unity of the prior essays. And, distinguished as was the critical scholarship of Martineau, it is not of the same authority as his philosophical thinking. Many will go with him the whole way in his great Theistic argument, yet part company with him sharply in his New Testament criticism. To such a man, for example, as the late Richard Holt Hutton, the "Types" and the "Study" seemed almost perfect arguments, while he could not fail vehemently to dissent from many chapters in "The Seat of Authority." Tennyson, too, enthusiastic about the "Study of Religion," was deeply disappointed by the latter work. The most commanding strength of the great teacher was undoubtedly concentrated in the "Study of Religion." That is his supreme positive contribution to religious philosophy. While I personally go with him in much of his last great volume from which many will dissent, I must still hold "A Study of Religion" to be his greatest constructive contribution to human thought.

In the eight chapters of his little book, Mr. Armstrong follows out the main lines of Dr. Martineau's great argument, giving, as our readers will remember, a most lucid exposition, from which those who are not able to undertake the study of the work itself will gain a clear conception of the foundation truths of religion, as interpreted by Dr. Martineau; and it may well be that readers of this little book will be encouraged under its guidance to grapple at least with some portions of "A Study of Religion" itself.

After an introductory chapter come sections on "What is Religion?" "From Ethics to Religion," "Can we really know?" "The World Maker," "The Fountain of Holiness." In these the two chief foundations of Dr. Martineau's Theism, the demand of the human understanding for a Living Cause behind phenomena, and the demand of the human conscience for a Living Righteousness behind the moral law, are clearly set forth; and then follow two concluding sections on "Pitfalls of Philosophy," and "Shall the Soul Die?" In the Preface Mr. Armstrong mentions the third argument which he has added in his own book, "God and the Soul," the argument from "the perception by the emotional nature of man of a Living Love behind things sublime and beautiful—an intuitive sense of a Divine Presence in Nature such as that of which Wordsworth is the prophet"; of this he says:—

> It seems justifiable and not unimportant to record that, in the last conversation which I was privileged to hold with the great teacher (in February, 1897), he gave a most generous and cordial recognition to to this contention, asserting that in his view the argument from this intuition was of parallel force and rank to the arguments from causality and conscience.

And the Preface concludes:—"With a reverence and gratitude which words cannot measure to him whose thinking has illuminated all my path, I send forth this booklet as a lowly tribute to his memory."

With this we cannot refrain from quoting also the concluding sentence of the book, which Mr. Armstrong has added to the last article on "Shall the Soul Die?" as here reprinted:—"Now that the slim and noble figure and the beautiful countenance lit with the very light of heaven have passed for ever from our vision, we can only register our fervent thankfulness that this great teacher was permitted by Him, in whose hands are the lives of men, to put forth this mighty argument for all that makes the world a temple and the soul a shrine, while still, in spite of the load of years, the eye of his spiritual vision was undimmed and his intellect had lost naught of its subtlety or grasp."

"IN TUNE WITH THE INFINITE."*

A book with this title seems to commend itself to all who are conscious of the jarring notes that come in from every side to mar the harmony of life. In an early chapter, the author reminds us that "the great central fact in human life is the coming into a conscious, vital realisation of our oneness with the Infinite Life, and the opening of ourselves fully to this Divine inflow; that just in the degree in which we do this do we actualise in ourselves the qualities and powers of the Infinite Life, and make ourselves channels through which the Infinite Intelligence and Power can work." This thought, which from different points of view he enforces throughout the volume, he illustrates very beautifully by a parable of a pond, which, so long, and only so long, as it drew its water from a great reservoir among the hills lay, pure and clear, embosomed in richest verdure, and fed by its overflowing streams the neighbouring lands. One is reminded of Theodore Parker's simile of the great mill-wheel at West Roxbury, which was turned by the mountain stream.

A special point to be noticed in Mr. Trine's treatment of his subject is that he never fails to recognise the two agencies, Divine and human, and the freedom of the personal will by which, as "individualised spirits," human beings can make, as they choose, their own Heaven or Hell. "In Tune with the Infinite" is a book full of inspiring, strengthening thoughts. We are reminded of the power of the human will, how its regulation and directing lie in our own hands; of the marvellous, often unrecognised, influence of our thought forces and mental states on those around us—forces and states which it lies with us to cultivate rightly; and of the ever-increasing illumination and intuitions which may be ours through the Divine inspiration.

Great stress is laid on the power of thought and will over the physical, as well as the moral and spiritual, nature of each individual: on the evil results of harbouring in the mind habits of distrust, fear, envy and tendencies to worry. Some readers, perhaps, may not wholly sympathise with the author's views when he enters upon the topic of "Spiritual Healing"; but all must appreciate the general teaching of a book which impresses so earnestly the conviction expressed in the well-known words of Dr. Martineau:—"The helping graces of Heaven descend and meet the soul intent to rise."

The pages abound with beautiful passages, and numberless quotations might well be made.

These are among the closing words:—

As one comes into and lives continually in the full conscious realisation of his oneness with the Infinite Power and Life, then all else follows. This it is to come into the realisation of heaven's richest treasures while walking the earth. This is to bring heaven down to earth, or rather to bring earth up to heaven. This it is to exchange weakness and impotence for strength; sorrows and sighings for joy; fears and forebodings for faith; longings for realisations. This it is to come into the fullness of peace, power, and plenty. This it is to be in tune with the Infinite.

MISS COOKE'S "WHITTIER."*

"His poems we can understand. He's like folks—Whittier is." Undoubtedly the old farmer, from whom that saying is quoted, was right; but the simplicity of Whittier's character, and of his writing, does not tell the whole secret of the strong hold many of his poems have on our affections. To the simplicity must be added the open vision of a pure heart, a directness of spiritual insight and a noble moral fervour, which set some of his poems in a place apart, and give him a rank not altogether determined by the quality of his literary gifts.

For this reason, while the elders treasure many of Whittier's poems, it is specially good for our children to grow familiar with the best that he has written, and at the same time to know the man himself. To this end they can have no better guide than Miss Cooke, who, in her story of Lloyd Garrison's life, had already given a charming picture of the Quaker poet, and now in this little book has told the story more completely.

The first awakening of the Quaker farmer's lad to the delights of poetry, the first visit of Lloyd Garrison, the steadfast purpose with which the young man made his way into the world of letters, the simple heroism of his devotion to the anti-slavery cause, his experiences in those troubled times, and after the victory was won, the peaceful happiness of his closing years and his growing acceptance as a poet—all this is told by Miss Cooke, with fullest sympathy with the spirit of Whittier's life, and in that delightful manner with which our readers are happily familiar.

For a class of elder children, or a home-reading circle, it would be a very pleasant task to go through this little book, at the same time making a study of some of Whittier's poems; and from all lovers of the Quaker poet this story of his life should receive a cordial welcome.

In making selections from "Fors Clavigera," Miss Wurtzburg has aimed at "opening its message to all sorts and conditions of men for whom it may be practically inaccessible by reason of its difficulty, length and costliness." Many such will be grateful for her careful and devoted work. Ruskin's ethical and social teaching is here brought into clear relief, and to the selections is prefixed the "St. George's Creed." After a preliminary section, there are three main divisions—Ethic, Economic, and Didactic. The book is issued by Mr. Allen in the form familiar to readers of Ruskin's own works, and will well repay earnest study on the part of those who desire to understand his social as distinguished from his art teaching.

Mr. Spielmann's book is more popular in its contents, giving a pleasant sketch of Ruskin's life, and many interesting particulars of the author's intercourse with him, especially in connection with the Magazine of Art. The book includes an article on "The Black Arts, a Reverie in the Strand," which Ruskin wrote for Mr. Spielmann, and there are also a large number of illustrations, including more than a dozen reproductions of portraits and busts of Ruskin and facsimiles of his writing.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Martineau's "Seat of Authority in Religion."

It is the singleness of this life in God that gave its uniqueness to the personality of Jesus; referring back all his experiences to the infinitely Perfect, all his sorrows to the eternal blessedness, all his disappointments to the living Fountain of hope. The deluding impressions of a drudging and suffering world were habitually checked and transcended by a recovered contact with the one and only Good. Stealing out before the dawn, or lingering on the hills into the night, he quenched in the silence the wrangling of disciples and the importunities of the crowd, and received, in answer to his prayer, a fresh share of the Love which overarches and must penetrate the world. Lifted, in these meditative moments, to the Divine point of view, he apprehends the essences of things, sees them no longer as they are, but as they are meant to be; and is doubly touched, with a true joy in them, as far as they give forth their intended nature entire and unspoiled, and with a deep longing, where it is left in the dark, or marred in the conscious light, to bring it to the birth or redeem it from its death. The whole hierarchy of created beings, in ascending types from the grass of the earth to the angels of heaven, was sacred and lovely to him as the depository and vehicle of the Divine thought, which could always be read in their possibilities, and only in voluntary agents be missed in fact. Amid the forms of unconscious life, too simple to go astray and appointed only to detain the air and dews and mould them into leafage and blossom, what gladness flashed from his eye and broke from his lips as he looked and said, "Behold the lilies of the field." In the instinctive creatures, moved hither and thither to what they need by an infallible thought that is all done for them, with what a heart-leap of delight did he read for them the providing care which they knew not, when their wings were heard overhead and their shadow floated along the grass, and he exclaimed, "Behold the birds of the air; they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them!" In the more manifold nature of the little child, still in the playtime of his waking impulses, each with its right to have him as it comes, but intended by revelation of its ordered place to rise from instinctive to divine, how genuine is his embrace of their free innocence, and how pathetic his hinted prayer that, through the guardian angels of life, it may pass unstained into voluntary holiness! In whom else, among the regenerators of the world, do you meet with this tender enthusiasm for natures that are less than moral, this sympathy with impulse still at large and waiting for the discipline of thought and will? Their characteristic has usually been a stern and suspicious attitude towards the realm of nature below the sphere of grace, nay, even a disposition to deny the beauty of the world and the blessedness of human life, and designate them together as a howling wilderness; and, on the strength of this theory, to disparage literature, art, science, and all the products of the "natural man" as "carnal" and foreign to the children of God.

Instead of shrouding the real earth beneath this dark pall hiding it from heaven, instead of despairing of any good but by escape beyond humanity, Jesus looked for it nowhere else, and lived on the earth as already bathed in heaven. The illusion of asceticism had no hold on him: there was nothing to kill out and abolish in any nature: in all that was God-given he beheld only what was good, so soon and so long as it kept its appointed place. To him the pure and spiritual was not beyond the material, but within it, ever seeking to clothe itself in form and colour, and breathe out its thought in waves of sound. The outer folds of things seemed to fall away before him, and lay their meaning bare; and hence he so often saw in those around him a light of good, a shade of ill, which they knew not themselves; and by a hint, or even a glance, touched the one with hope, and softened the other with shame and tears. No disguise, of decorum or indecorum, availed to hide from him the doublings or the simplicity of the soul within.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND SUMMER EXCURSIONS.

Sir,—Many people have already been inquiring whether there will be an excursion this year.

It has been decided that no arrangements can be made for this year, but we are planning something for the following year 1901, in England or Wales.

May I ask the excursionists of last year and former years if they will kindly send some contributions to the Postal Mission stall at the forthcoming Bazaar on May 1? We should very much value their help in this matter.

Articles or money will be gladly received by Mrs. Morton, 11, Exeter-road, Brondesbury, N.W., on behalf of the Postal Mission.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A POET'S CHILDHOOD AS DESCRIBED BY HIMSELF.

Most children know, and perhaps dislike, some of Wordsworth's poems. When I was a child I detested "The Pet Lamb," and could not see any sense in "We are Seven." Now I admire him as one of the greatest English poets, who has taught us to perceive a deeper meaning and beauty in Nature. He has given us in poetry an account of his own childhood, which, perhaps, may be interesting to children. He was born in 1770, in the beautiful Lake District, among mountains and streams, waterfalls and lakes, and learnt to love them when he was quite a child, before he had learnt to think about them. He became a very grave and serious poet, but his childhood was a merry one with plenty of healthy play, which he thoroughly enjoyed. He says of himself and his comrades, "We were a noisy crew." They bathed, and boated, and skated at night, and wandered freely about the beautiful country in their sports. The child-poet entered heartily into all the fun. And yet as children may, he felt the beauty that was about him, and the presence of a solemn and mysterious living power in Nature. Wordsworth thought that such feelings were natural to children, and that he afterwards became a poet because he did not lose them when he grew up.

He was allowed a great deal of liberty at a very early age. He says:—

Oh, many a time have I, a five years' child,
In a small mill-race severed from its stream,
Made one long bathing of a summer's day;
Basked in the sun and plunged and basked again.

He had got rid of the trouble of clothes, and ran about on the sand, and pushed through "groves of yellow ragwort" like "a little naked savage." How delightful it must have been. I suppose there was some one to take care of him, but he does not mention it.

Before he was ten he used to wander about the hills alone for "half the night," setting snares for woodcocks, and visiting them to see if any of the birds were caught. And "sometimes," he says (I wish it had been only once), he took the bird from another boy's snare. But he felt that it was wrong: his conscience was not silenced. He writes that

When the deed was done
I heard among the solitary hills
Low breathings coming after me, and sounds
Of undistinguishable motion, steps
Almost as silent as the turf they trod.

And so the little boy, not ten years old, alone on the great hills in the stillness of the night, crept home afraid and ashamed of what he had done. Perhaps it was the last time he did it. But his words read as if he afterwards, more than once, did the same thing again, when the "strong desire o'erpowered his better reason." In time he overcame such temptations, and grew up to be a very onesth man.

On another occasion, one summer evening, he took a small boat without leave, and rowed out alone into the lake. "It was an act of stealth and troubled pleasure." As he drew further from the shore, the summit of a large mountain rose into sight above the low hills near at hand. It seemed to the boy poet, troubled in his mind by his own wrong-doing, as if it was some huge dark object rising up of its own accord, to watch him, and striding after him. He took the boat back and went home. But he could not for a long time get rid of the fear of some dim power about him. So this brave boy, familiar with the objects about him, and loving them with boyish love, was made a coward by his conscience.

A brave boy he was. That is shown by his dangerous climbs among the mountain crags after birds' nests.

He says that he had "hung above the raven's nest by knots of grass and half-inch fissures in the slippery rock." He was a brave boy. But he also had the feeling of a poet. For while he was hanging alone onto the precipitous rock at no small risk of his life, it seemed to him as if the clouds and sky and the sound of the wind were all wonderfully changed. It made so deep an impression upon his mind that he remembered it distinctly many years afterwards. He felt, though he did not then think much about it, as if Nature was alive, and mountains and clouds were his living companions. And indeed the life of God is in them, and we may feel very strongly that He is with us when we are alone by the great sea or among the solemn mountains.

The boy Wordsworth felt that, When he went out skating on the lake with other boys after dark, joining heartily in their noisy games, he yet sometimes drew aside from "the uproar;" or else, when they went flying before the wind and the shadowy banks and solitary cliffs seemed to come sweeping through the darkness, he would dig his heels into the ice and stop short. And he noticed how the earth still appeared to move for a time, and "stood and watched" till all was tranquil as a dreamless sleep,

He felt as if there were souls in lonely places, and living powers, or "presences" as he calls them, haunting him among his boyish sports. Nature was not dead for him, but alive. And many have learnt from him to feel the life of God in Nature. We cannot altogether understand and explain it. But we may feel it in our minds and have a great peace and delight in it; feeling a great strong loving presence about us.

Not all children, or all grown-up people either, feel in that way. There are very good and sensible men for whom all this would have very little meaning. We are not all made the same. But some children, more perhaps than people think, are in a small way like the boy Wordsworth. And if any of you who read this "Children's Column" at all share his feelings, I want to say two things to them. They are not to be conceited about it. Our doings matter a great deal more than our feelings. And, on the other hand, they should not be ashamed, if they like to go quietly into some beautiful place better than playing football. The enjoyment of Nature, that children may have, may be a great and sacred delight to them at the time, and a great blessing to them all their lives.

LONDON, MARCH 31, 1900.

THE COMING WEEK.

In looking forward to the meetings of the National Conference at Leicester during the coming week, there is one thing of which we may be confident, for the experience of Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds, London, Manchester, and Sheffield has been uniform in that respect. There will be the delight of a great gathering, the stimulus of numbers, the strong sense of unity in spirit, and renewed consecration to a great and holy cause. And there will be as before the refreshment of brotherly intercourse, the greetings of friends long separated in distant fields of labour, and abundant conference not only at the times and on the stated subjects set down upon the programme, but in the frank confidence of more intimate talk among those who are pledged to the same high service and in many different ways are engaged in a common work.

Of the actual programme of the Conference we hope nothing but good. There will be one thought in every heart, and it will find fitting utterance, for Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE is to speak on the "Life and Influence of Dr. MARTINEAU," and a memorial resolution will be moved by Mr. STEINTHAL, and seconded by Mr. ARMSTRONG. At the service of Communion, most fittingly held on the first evening, there will be a special season of holy remembrance, in which the hidden fellowship will be deepened with those who in former years brought their faith and courage and affectionate sympathy to the meetings of the Conference, but now have passed into the great Silence, which yet is eloquent of the life with GOD; while the devotional service with which each morning begins will afford the opportunity of striking the right key-note for the discussions which are to follow. The special subjects to be discussed are of vital interest to the whole body of our churches. No one is better fitted than Mr. EDWIN ODGERS to insist on the importance of a right understanding of our Freedom and Faith, and it is peculiarly fitting at the end of a century of religious life that we should be asked to consider its historical development, and the lessons it has taught of the principles on which Free Churches must be founded, and their ideal of religious fellowship. Mr. ELLIS is to deal with a very practical question, and will speak from the experience of a proved capacity on "How best to organise the Religious Life of our Young People." Of no less urgency is Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON'S subject, "The Future Supply of our Ministers," while Mr. JACKS'S paper on "The Conduct of Public Worship" deals with what must be of perennial interest and of the first importance to all churches. As at the Sheffield Conference a paper without discussion was read by Mr. CARPENTER on "The Place of Immortality in Religious Belief"; so at Leicester we are to have two papers, one by Mr. PHILIP WICKSTEED on "The Fear of GOD and the Sense of Sin," the other by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD on "Gospel Interpretation." When further it is remembered that Mr. HARGROVE is to preach the Conference sermon, that Dr. BLAKE ODGERS is President, and that at the public meeting the speakers are to be Mr. PAGE HOPPS, so well known in Leicester, Dr. KLEIN, Mr. WOOD, and Mr. F. MADDISON, M.P., it will be realised what good ground there is for confidence in the abundant success of the Conference.

To one other matter of great interest and importance we have not yet alluded. The first meeting of the Conference at Liverpool in 1882 is specially memorable for the paper read by Mr. HARRY RAWSON on "Ministers' Stipends and Augmentation Funds," which concluded with a proposal for the foundation of the Sustentation Fund, and was followed immediately by the late Sir HENRY TATE'S generous gift of £1,000, which most happily secured the success of the effort. At Sheffield Mr. COGAN CONWAY read a paper on a cognate and equally pressing question, "The Superannuation of Ministers," and in our present issue will be found the Report of the Special Committee on this subject, which is to be presented and considered at the business meeting of the Conference next week.

What the resolutions are, which are to be moved on this Report, we do not yet know, but they could not be in more sympathetic hands than those of Mr. COGAN CONWAY and Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH, and we may be sure that the subject will receive most earnest consideration. There is undoubtedly scope for a Ministers' Superannuation Fund, the foundation of which might signalise the Leicester meeting of the Conference; but we cannot in any way anticipate the discussion which is to take place, and can now only commend the Report to the attention of our readers.

DR. MARTINEAU'S NATIONAL CONFERENCE LETTER.

DR. MARTINEAU'S great effort at the Leeds Conference in 1888 will be still vividly in the minds of all who were present on that occasion, but there will not be so many of our readers who remember the letter which, through Mr. David Ainsworth, Chairman of the Committee, he addressed to the first meeting of the Conference held in Liverpool in 1882. The letter not only touches now the chords of reverent memory, but may well stir us to renewed consecration to the lofty ideal of religious life which it sets forth, and we therefore here reproduce the main portions of it:—

"At a crisis when many heads are dizzied and many hearts alarmed by the rapid changes in thought and in society, it may not be out of place for a veteran, himself not unaffected by them, to avow his unabated confidence in the Christian Congregation as the most beneficent of human institutions—the best guardian of the sanctities of life and the asylum of its sweetest affections. Among those who are alienated from it there are doubtless some who may sustain themselves in a higher atmosphere, and many who intellectually occupy a level above its average teaching. But, on a wide comparison of the population within the churches and that without, the former, I am persuaded, will be found to contain, in spite of its minority, by far the greater part of the conscience, the humanity, the purity, the nobleness, which are the cement of society and the backbone of national character.

"When I look at any choice example of this institution, and ask myself what have been the real springs of its power, I find them in three conditions:

"(1) That its members unite purely for Fellowship and Growth in the Christian life and mind.

"(2) That, in its external action, it bears down with Missionary zeal on the Paganism and irreligion and neglected suffering which it sees around.

"(3) That on other Churches it looks as on confederates, moving upon different lines in the same sacred warfare.

So that these three—namely, Sympathies of Godliness within the congregation Aggression on Sin and misery without; Loyal Affection for comrades under other banners—are the animating principles which make even a small Christian Society a leaven of moral health to a neighbourhood ten times its size.

"The first condition embraces two aims, of Fellowship in the Christian mind, and Growth in it. Among persons various in age and position these two are unequally felt, and for their furtherance should resort, I think, each to its own methods. All the Public Services are the proper medium and aliment of Fellowship; while for Growth provision should be made by Special Classes and Fraternities, which each member may accept or decline. The people as a whole need a kindling voice to interpret and deepen their common trusts and settled affections; the minister, as an individual, needs scope for fresh convictions of duty and lights of thought; and it is not well that either need should be made absolute, to the prejudice of the other. It is indispensable to provide, not only for such training of the young in moral and spiritual truth as may bring them to the Christlike mind, but also for acquainting all willing learners with the present aspects of theological knowledge. But it is one thing to open congregational classes in which the grounds of conflicting opinion may be systematically explained; it is quite another to disappoint an assembly of thirsting souls, that come to drink from the fountain of life, with dry criticisms or philosophical abstractions. And so with respect to current questions of social reform and political obligation—e.g., temperance, war, &c. It is inevitable that every faithful man should make a conscience of his belief upon these things; but he cannot on that account, if he be the head of a society where beliefs and consciences differ, assume more than his individual right of free action and persuasion within the circle that sympathy gathers round him. If in early life I had distinctly conceived the rule here laid down, I should have avoided some mistakes. And I could earnestly wish that my younger brethren might reverence their office, more than I have done, as representing the collective piety of a mixed congregation.

"The second condition assumes, what experience has at last brought home to us, that no Christian Society can subsist upon its own internal relations alone, and, like a monastery, shut out the confusion and the cries of the world around. We acknowledge, with all Christendom, that the Missionary spirit is inseparable from the religious life; and that it is impossible for a people to train themselves in the school of Christ, yet remain quiet neighbours to the victims of passion, ignorance, and wrong. Were there is no sorrow felt for those to whom God is dead, and the heavens are dark, no pity for those whose life is a flight from pursuing Fate into the grim arms of 'the last enemy,' no longing to seek and to save the lost, how can there be either love of God or 'enthusiasm of humanity'? No Christian Society gives any adequate expression of its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood; and it is but a selfish membership that looks coldly on such evangelising work. It ought not to satisfy us that we institute and equip Mission stations in parts of our large towns that need them most. Every visible place of worship needs a character, a significance, a spiritual physiognomy upon the spot. It should be more than brick and stone to the eyes that daily see it. Even from the outside let it look upon the passers-by with a gaze of tender mercy and solemn warning and recovered hope. Our Town Missions would be a doubtful blessing to us, if we made them an excuse for surrendering an essential function of every Christian Church. I remember nothing more cheering in the contemporary history of our churches than the admirable experiments of Mr. Beard in Liverpool, and more recently of Mr. Hopps in Leicester, for extending the circle of religious sympathy to classes that too rarely feel its embrace. From my heart I honour the faith and courage evinced in these efforts, and wonder what we have been about that they have not sooner been born within us, and more widely wakened us to our duty.

"When I speak of the Missionary spirit as a Christian characteristic, I mean the attitude of a religious soul towards an unreligious, of devout faith towards no faith, of clear-visioned conscience towards moral blindness, of a beloved son towards an orphaned outcast; and I do not mean the attitude of one school of theology towards another. The difference of the two relations is surely plain. Where the interval between myself and another is moral and spiritual,—where he lives by righteous rule and I by chance passion,—where he is strong and calm and bright, and I am neither master of myself nor in the hands of a Divine deliverer,—there is at the heart of both a secret consciousness of their real position: he yearns to lift me up; I feel that he is above me: I am prostrate in my weakness before him, and easily persuaded to stretch forth the hand of dependence. My conscience invests him with an authority which silences the vain pretence at equality, and places me with docility at his feet. It is otherwise where the interval is one of mere intellectual judgment as between two thought-out theologies. Each has a self-preference which is without response in the other; and neither has, by natural or Divine right, any Master-function relatively to the other. The presumptive equality between them is perfect; and I can never usefully study and compare them, except with the belief that I have as much to learn as to teach; and that what has sustained the life of many wise and saintly souls cannot be without its hidden store of truth and good. Hence (let me confess) I could never take, and could never approve, a Missionary attitude towards any of the differing churches of Christendom, or help feeling repelled by Missionary approaches on their part. It is easy to avoid such reciprocation of arrogance without lapse into doctrinal reticence or indifference. Let questions of theology and morals be investigated, like all other questions, on pure grounds of evidence, and dealt with, not by the Advocate, but by the Judge; or, if this rule be too severe, let the Advocate's part never be taken except in reply, in order to rectify polemical distortions and restore the balance disturbed by party zeal. In all other cases, the third condition should come unreservedly into play: the various faiths of Christians around us should be treated with deference, as allies in foreign dress. Leave to the schools definitions of doctrine: let Churches address themselves, with one heart though in many tones, to the redemption of human life from guilt and sorrow. In the presence of great duties, under the inspiration of high affections, men are always drawing nearer to one another: in the eagerness of argument and the encounter of clashing beliefs, they are usually parting further from each other; and for one error that is struck down by the blow of controversy, a score will silently vanish because unable to breathe the air of a new age. Either every church is bound to attempt the conversion of every other, or else all must live together in the harmony of mutual respect, and commit whatever is special in their cause to the arbitrament of time and the widening of thought. We all see Divine things 'through a glass darkly'; but sure I am that my doctrines cannot be right unless that Church is dearest to me which is most deeply rooted in the love of God and of richest fruits in the love of man."

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE AT LEICESTER.

The Guide Book to the National Conference, which has been issued to ministers and delegates, in view of the meetings at Leicester next week, contains not only a useful map of the town (of which the scale, not noted in the map, is six inches to the mile), indicating the various places of meeting, but also an interesting "Historical Sketch," which recalls the close association of Leicester with many of the great events and some of the greatest names of our national life.

Of the old Roman days there are still remains, not only in the name, but in fine pieces of tesselated pavement and in an interesting fragment of wall masonry near St. Nicholas Church. In Anglo-Saxon days, we are told, Leicester was the seat of a bishopric, and of a Royal Mint, which remained until the time of Henry II. The old Castle, which has now shrunk into an Assize Court, was in the Middle Ages a stronghold of the Earls of Leicester, of whom Simon de Montfort is the chief to be remembered, while the line of the great Earls ended when Henry Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt, became King of England.

Among the most interesting associations are the following:—

Parliaments were twice held in Leicester during the fifteenth century, the plague on one occasion rendering Westminster dangerous; its gabled High-street saw the entry of Richard III. at the head of his army on his march to Bosworth Field; Cardinal Wolsey breathed out his despairing farewell to life's vain ambitions in the guest-chamber of Leicester Abbey; Lady Jane Grey was familiar with its streets and proffered hospitalities, and the unhappy prisoner, Mary Queen of Scots, more than once passed a night within its walls. Its sturdy Puritanism made a gallant stand against the Royalist forces in 1645, when Charles I. and Prince Rupert besieged it, and the Mayor's Parlour of the old Guildhall, which still remains, became the scene of a protracted discussion and final refusal to comply with the King's demands, resulting in the bombardment and sack of the town, with much bloodshed and violence. Leicester was, however, re-captured by Cromwell and Fairfax a fortnight afterwards, King Charles having fled at full speed through its streets after the Battle of Naseby two days earlier.

The spirit of inquiry and dissent in both political and religious matters has been a tradition in this town and locality from very early times. Robert Grosstête, Archdeacon of Leicester in the days of Simon de Montfort, raised his voice against Papal assumption and the corruption of the clergy. In the fourteenth century Wycliffe's preachers, stirred to zeal by the great Reformer at his neighbouring rectory of Lutterworth, carried on the crusade in its streets and open places, until denounced and brought to penance in St. Margaret's Church; and in the gloomy days of Queen Mary the crown of martyrdom was won by Latimer of Thurcaston, a village four miles north of Leicester.

Of the great names of English Nonconformity, those of George Fox, Bunyan and Wesley appear in the annals of Leicester, while towards the close of last century, Dr. Carey, afterwards noted as a Baptist missionary, preached for some years in the Harvey-lane Chapel, working during the week as a shoemaker; he was succeeded by Robert Hall, who at the beginning of the present century was widely known as a most eloquent preacher.

The story of the "Great Meeting" and its younger sister church, as told in the sketch, we will here reproduce. It seems that as early as 1680 a society of Presbyterians had been formed in Leicester, as a result of the Act of Uniformity of 1662. The sketch speaks of the ejected as "Presbyterian Clergy," but there were of course large numbers of Independents among them. From the society of 1680, which at that time worshipped in a small building on the west side of the town, the present Great Meeting congregation is directly descended, and its story is thus told:—

In 1708 the Presbyterians built themselves a handsome chapel in Bond-street, then called Parchment-lane, naming it the "Great Meeting," the first brick building of importance in Leicester, and still our honoured place of worship. At the time of its erection, the chapel in its green graveyard stood close to the confines of the town, in a sparsely-built neighbourhood, semi-rural, with orchards and gardens divided by fences and mud walls. Adjoining was the old "Butt Close," an acre or two of ground granted by Queen Elizabeth to the youth of Leicester for practice with the long bow, and which still gives its name to the narrow thoroughfare just beyond the chapel. A day-school seems to have been attached to the Great Meeting at its foundation; and in 1783 the first Sunday-school in Leicester assembled within its precincts, three years earlier than the simultaneous opening of eleven Sunday-schools on July 23, 1786, by a combined movement of Church and orthodox Dissent, which claimed to have originated them in this town. Among the early recollections of many of the elder members of our present congregation is the bevy of neat white caps and "tippets" in the corner of the chapel gallery. The present school buildings, also used largely for mission purposes, were erected in 1859, and form one block with those of an earlier date.

In the year 1866 the chapel underwent great alterations by the addition of a chancel and the re-seating of the interior, but its main outward features are still identical with those of its earliest years.

The roll of ministers of the Great Meeting is a short one, for no less than 112 years were occupied by the services of two of them, the Rev. Hugh Worthington and our well-remembered and beloved pastor, the Rev. Charles Berry, who each filled its pulpit for fifty-six years. With the words of the latter, written by request and afterwards inscribed upon a brass tablet placed upon the original pulpit, when it was removed from the chapel in 1866, we will close this brief sketch:—

"This pulpit was in the Great Meeting-house, Leicester, from 1708, the date of its erection, to 1866, when great alterations were made. During that period the following were, in succession, the ministers of the chapel:—

Rev. Mr. Green.
Rev. Mr. Gee, died 1730.
Rev. James Watson, 1730—1741.
Rev. Hugh Worthington, 1741—1797.
Rev. Robt. Jacombe, 1797—1803.
Rev. Charles Berry, 1803—1859.

The Rev. Drs. Doddridge, Jennings, Priestley, Toulmin, Belsham, Barnes, and other eminent divines, have preached in it. 'Man dies, matter decays, truth is immortal.'"

To complete the record of ministers of the Great Meeting, the following names must be added:—

Rev. Charles C. Coe, for five years co-pastor with Mr. Berry, 1855—1874.
Rev. R. Laird Collier, 1874—1876.
Rev. John Page Hopps, 1876—1892.

The Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., entered upon his ministry in the Great Meeting, March 26, 1893.

In 1866 the Free Christian Church was formed. It met originally in the Temperance Hall, removed to Wellington-street in 1875, and has within the last few months left this for Narborough-road, an entirely new neighbourhood on the west side of the town. The schoolroom only is at present built, and is used for both service and Sunday-school; but a church is shortly to be erected on the adjoining land.

The following is the roll of ministers:—

Rev. W. Mitchell, 1866—1870.
Rev. A. F. Macdonald, M.A., 1870—1877.
Rev. J. J. Wright, 1877—1879.
Rev. J. C. Lunn, 1879—1882.
Rev. J. Moden, 1882—1886.
Rev. W. Agar, 1886—1897.
Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., 1897—.

THE SUPERANNUATION OF MINISTERS.

The following report of the Committee on the Superannuation of Ministers is to be presented to the National Conference at Leicester, on Thursday, April 5:—

It will be in the recollection of the ministers and delegates that at our last Triennial Conference Mr. Cogan Conway read a paper on "The Superannuation of Ministers." In that paper he pointed out the evils which at present flow from the absence of a fund for enabling ministers to retire from active service in the ministry when they are past their work. He urged that there is a solemn duty resting on our group of churches to furnish some provision for the old age of men who have devoted their lives to its service, in most cases for remuneration so small as to preclude the possibility of their making such provision for themselves. Such assistance would be in no sense eleemosynary, but would rather be in the nature of deferred pay. And he put the case of an aged minister who has no private income to support himself and his wife when his stipend ceases: he is naturally reluctant to resign his pulpit. His congregation, who still love and respect him, will take no step to cause him to resign. Yet the life of the congregation is withering up: the young people wander away to other chapels where the services are brighter and more attractive, and where they are called upon to take their share in active work.

In Lancashire and Cheshire, it is true, there is a Widows' Fund, the operations of which in those two counties to some extent meet the evil. But no one who is not the minister of a congregation in Lancashire or Cheshire can become a member of this society: nor indeed have the ministers resident in those counties any right to join it: it is in fact a private society administering its own funds in its own way.

There is also the well-known Ministers' Benevolent Society, which carries on a most beneficial work, but from its very nature it cannot give a right to benefits, and therefore does not exactly meet the case in view.

At the close of the discussion on Mr. Conway's paper the following resolution was passed:—

That this Conference recommends that earnest attempts should be made by congregations and individuals to increase their subscriptions to the Ministers' Benevolent Society, and that a Committee be appointed to confer with the directors of the Ministers' Benevolent Society, and take such action in relation to the superannuation of our ministers as they consider desirable; and that the Committee consist of Messrs. John Harwood, David Martineau, Frederick Nettlefold, David Ainsworth, Edwin Lawrence, M.P., J. Cogan Conway, W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., Frank Taylor, Charles Fenton, and such gentlemen as they may invite to join their number.

Some of these gentlemen subsequently did not see their way to serve on this Committee—the remainder now present to the Conference the following REPORT.

Your Committee have held several meetings, and considered many schemes and suggestions. At an early stage of their deliberations they had the benefit of a consultation with some of the officials and managers of the Ministers' Benevolent Society, who afforded them valuable assistance. Your Committee desire to say at once that they have from the first been anxious that no scheme which emanates from them should in any way clash with the useful work done by this Society: an anxiety which they are sure will be shared by the ministers and delegates. But at the same time your Committee feel that the needs of the case will not be met merely by increasing the funds and widening the scope of the operations of this society. For it is a Benevolent Society: and a Benevolent Society, as such, confers no rights on its members. It gives to those whom it seeks to benefit no clear and indisputable claim to any fixed annuity. And this your Committee feels is an essential part of any scheme which is to command the co-operation of so independent and self-reliant a body of men as our ministers. The desire of your Committee (which your Committee feel sure is also the desire of our ministers) is to help those gentlemen to help themselves—to call on them to contribute as much as each can to the necessary outlay—giving them in return an absolute right to a certain benefit at a certain date.

Your Committee accordingly conferred with eminent actuaries, connected with three of our best-known Life Assurance societies: and eventually, after rejecting many more ambitious schemes, they have decided to recommend to the National Conference the following scheme:—

The Equitable Life Assurance Society is willing to insure any of our ministers on the following terms:—The minister must pay premiums according to the tables in the schedule to this report from the commencement of the insurance till he attains the age of sixty-five. Then all payments from him will cease, and instead he will receive an annuity of £52 a year till his death, and on his death his representatives will receive £250. If he dies under the age of sixty-five, his representatives will receive the £250; but in this case the Society will pay no annuity. The insured will have, of course, an absolute right to these benefits, provided he pays his premiums regularly. And a fund must be raised to assist him to pay these premiums, so long as he remains a minister on the roll of the Conference. In those cases in which the premium did not exceed £20, the Committee propose that half the premium should be paid by the minister, and half out of the income of the fund. But where the premium exceeded £20, the fund would pay £10 and no more, leaving the minister to pay the remainder. This would encourage early insurance.

Your Committee estimate that for this purpose either a sum of £20,000 or an assured income of £600 is necessary. Should the scheme prove a success and its operations become more extensive, more capital may become necessary; but for the first ten or fifteen years they believe that the figures named would be adequate. And they believe that with so desirable an object in view as the provision of an annuity, however small, for our aged ministers, there would be no insuperable difficulty in raising the necessary funds.

It would be easy, should the promises of donations justify such a step, to rearrange the figures so as to secure to every minister insuring under this scheme an annuity of £104 after the age of sixty-five, instead of the meagre minimum of £52 a year. A table of premiums on the basis of £104 a year is also added. If this were adopted, it would probably be necessary for the trustees of the fund to contribute, in some cases, to the extent of £15 a year. But for the present your Committee is content to submit to the Conference the more modest plan suggested above, in the earnest hope that it may be approved and adopted: as they feel certain that some scheme of the kind is urgently needed among our churches.

All communications in reference to this report should be addressed to J. Cogan Conway, Esq., Brooklands, Ringwood.

THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS.

Sir,—Many of your readers will join with me in thanking Mr. Bennett for the articles, so careful, so suggestive, so full of moral sensitiveness, by which he has kindly answered the questions I ventured to put after reading his letter on the religious influence of the personality of Christ.

Still, after giving Mr. Bennett's views serious consideration I cannot concur with them; and as the subject is important, I beg permission to give the reasons of my dissent.

According to Mr. Bennett the forgiveness of sins is the most essential part of religion, because "everything centres round the primary fact of Sin."

But how can sin be a primary fact? To my mind, sin can only be a secondary fact, a consequence. The primary fact for me is my interior ideal of goodness and righteousness, which I regard as the expression of God's purpose concerning me, as the Divine revelation in my conscience of my true destination. I cannot call an action or a desire sinful, if I do not compare them to and judge them by the light of the moral ideal in my soul. It is only when I have pronounced an action or a desire to be contrary to the moral ideal that I can brand them as sin; and it is only when I have begun by loving in some measure the moral ideal, that I can suffer and grieve at having by action or by desire placed myself in wilful opposition to its beauty and holiness.

Mr. Bennett does not seem to have noticed that his own language implies the necessity of something previous to the fact of sin. "If there be a God," he writes, "who enters into spiritual relations with His creatures, then the existence in man of anything that hinders or destroys these relations must be the central fact in his experience." But must there not be first of all in man a knowledge of and a craving for these relations with God, or how could man attach such a mournful importance to the hindrance or destruction of those relations?

It follows that it must be a mistake to deduce the belief in the Fatherhood of God from the belief in the forgiveness of sins. "We must not say," writes Mr. Bennett, "He is the Father, and therefore He forgives; we must say, He is the Father, because he forgives." What! build our belief in God's goodness upon the forgiveness of sins, and not on the beneficent law of our being, of which sin is but the transgression? No, no; we must start further back and say: God is the Father, because He has destined us to a pure and noble end, to righteousness, love, and consequent happiness. It is the firm belief in our moral ideal which is the great generating cause of our belief in the beneficence of the almighty and inscrutable Power whom we call God.

If I have not this antecedent belief in God's kind purpose with regard to mankind, how can I ever form the notion of or conceive the wish for the forgiveness of sins. The forgiveness of sins? Whatever it means specifically, must it not imply the removal of some cause of separation between God and me? But if I do not believe in the Fatherhood of God, if I do not believe that God is good, why should I care about separation from Him, from a Being who may be indifferent or hostile to me? Or, again, the forgiveness of sin must imply the removal of some obstacle to the realisation of my destiny. But if I do not know anything about that destiny, if I am left in doubt as to whether it may not be an abject or wretched destiny, why should I care about the obstacles that may oppose its realisation?

But when I believe first that through God's benevolence my appointed end is the holiness and happiness of my being, then I am prepared to earnestly desire that any obstacle, which by my fault and frailty, I may have created for myself should be removed; and I am also prepared to believe that the beneficent Power which has purposed my good, is willing that any such obstacle should be removed from my path, and that any separation should cease between Himself and his poor erring creature. The way is therefore open to me for some conception, desire, and hope of the forgiveness of sins, in whatever sense the oppression may be understood.

It appears to me a legitimate conclusion of this first article, that not Sin or the Forgiveness of Sin, but the divine Ideal of Goodness and the Fatherhood of God are the primary facts of religion.

BIRMINGHAM: FAZELEY-STREET MISSION.

The annual Congregational meeting of the Church of Messiah Mission, Fazeley-street, took place on Monday, March 19. The Lord Mayor (who was accompanied by the Lady Mayoress) presided, and the meeting was a crowded and thoroughly enthusiastic gathering. The reports of the various institutions connected with the Mission were read by the different secretaries, and were of a most satisfactory character.

It was reported that the congregations on Sunday evenings were excellent, and at times overflowing, and all drawn from the surrounding neighbourhood. The Sunday-schools had upwards of 500 scholars, and through want of accommodation many had to be turned away. The children's service was an especially successful feature of the school. The boys' club had reached its highest point of prosperity during the year; the girls' club numbered upwards of 60 members with a high average weekly attendance. The Band of Hope, both junior and senior branches, had been vigorously carried on, and had advanced in numbers. The Band of Hope sick club had done a useful work in helping members in times of sickness, and forming provident habits among its members. The Benevolent Society had been active in its special work of visiting sick and absentee scholars, and was a typical illustration of the desire of the poor to help the poor. The recreation class for girls under fourteen years of age had an average attendance of 120, and the poor children spent very happy hours in marching, musical drill, recitation, and singing interspersed with games and stories. The cripple class had been in existence for seven years, and gathered the afflicted little ones from the slums of the neighbourhood weekly for a bright hour. The gymnasium class had maintained its popularity and efficiency. The systematic drill had done much to steady the rough boys full of undisciplined energy, and to teach them obedience and control. The junior and senior cricket clubs, and the cycle club had proved of great services as sources of health and pleasure and good fellowship between teachers and scholars.

The mother's meeting was a specially useful agency of the mission, the number of members being 157, representing various classes of social life among the poor. The Saturday night temperance meetings and concerts had attracted hundreds of working men and women from the allurements of the public-house, and had proved a stepping-stone to the higher ministries of the Mission. A large number of men brought in through the agency of the Mission had been formed into a brotherhood of workers, and were ready to undertake anything to further the interest of the Mission. The various thrift clubs had been increasingly used by those frequently hovering on the brink of poverty.

The ministry of fresh air, in providing holidays for children and adults, and the Window Garden Society had continued their beneficent work. The large amount of home visitation had assisted in the alleviation of the sadness and friendlessness of the poor in the district.

The Lord Mayor testified to his interest in the Mission, and heartily congratulated its members on the years of successful work. He pointed the high moral of cleanliness as an essential condition of health and happiness, and showed how it was possible, though admittedly difficult, to obtain and maintain it in such a congested district as that of the Mission. In driving this home to the minds and the hearts of the people, he regarded such organisations as the Mission as a most valuable agency, and he therefore rejoiced in its success in promoting the physical, social, and moral well-being of the people among and for whom it labours. St. Bartholomew's Ward, in which the Mission works, is known as one of the poorest neighbourhoods of the city, but the cheerful side may always be found by those who will visit the Mission at Fazeley-street. The one peculiarity of the Mission is that it attracts such a large number of men, and here Mr. Pipe had solved a great difficulty.

Mr. T. H. Russell (President of the Mission) said that in listening to the reports read by the different secretaries, apart from the evidences of untiring energy and devotion on the part of the workers, there were three things that struck him—(1.) The spirit of self-help breathing through them; (2.) The cheerful condition of the finances of the different societies, all showing a balance on the right side; (3.) the interest of teachers in their scholars as shown by the arrangements made for spending the Saturday afternoon holiday together, thus establishing very kindly relations.

The Rev. L. P. Jacks said he had just come from a meeting where they had been put to their wits end to know how best to help the drooping state of various churches. It was, indeed, an inspiration to come to such a splendid gathering, so full of life and enthusiasm.

Councillor J. S. Nettlefold said whenever visiting the Mission, though he might come depressed, he always went away feeling that it had been a tonic to him.

Votes of thanks to the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress brought the meeting to a close.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

The annual meeting, presided over by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, was held in the Lord Mayor's parlour, Town Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday afternoon. There was a very large and representative gathering. It was the largest annual meeting held for many years past. The Chairman read the following letter from Alderman Harry Rawson:—

Eccles, March 27.

Dear Mr. Chairman,—Until last evening, I had quite expected to attend the meeting to-day of the friends and supporters of the Manchester Domestic Mission. But a sudden attack of cold confines me to the house. I should have been glad to renew the expressions of my unabated confidence in the principles on which it was founded, and my high appreciation of its work, never more effective than at the present time. Of the numerous beneficent agencies in the city, few have been so long established. It is almost startling to realise that you will receive to-day the sixty-sixth report of its proceedings. Of the philanthropic and excellent men who took a prominent share in its foundation, few, if any, remain. Perhaps I can, better than anyone else, recall the time, because, as an apprentice, I assisted in setting up the type of the first report, and remember seeing the first missionary, John Ashworth, at my employer's place. Indeed, I have known, more or less, every one of his successors. But though none of the original promoters may yet be living, their plans have been perseveringly conducted by a long line of Committees and subscribers. There has been no sensationalism in their operations—the Mission has never been a proselytising institution—it has sought no sectarian advantages; it has cared for conversions only from intemperance, improvidence, and irreligion. Long before the appointment of official sanitary inspectors, this society's ministers directed the attention of the poor to the value of cleanliness, the importance of fresh air, and the injury to health of defective arrangements of other kinds. I believe they were really pioneers in this matter, and their reports were full of valuable suggestions. Their solicitude for neglected and unfortunate children, their sympathy and help in cases of extreme want, their successful efforts in Sunday-school work and worship as regards all ages—all these and many other labours must have been invaluable in a thousand ways, though always performed so quietly and unostentatiously as to attract an unimportant share of public attention.

Its present most earnest and excellent missionaries have well proved their claim to the cordial approval and support of all who are interested in the mission; and now that, happily, by the munificent donation of some friends, and the untiring devotion of others, it is free from debt, it has a brighter and yet more useful future for its varied and beneficent work.—Believe me, yours sincerely, Harry Rawson.

The Report, which had been printed and circulated amongst subscribers and others, was taken as read.

It was of a most interesting character, and showed that a great deal of uplifting work, of a most varied kind, was being done by the Mission at its two centres, Willert-street and Renshaw-street. The year was started with a deficit of £141, and, in addition, bills became due for work done, alterations, repairs, &c., amounting to £107, making a total of £248; and besides this there was an estimated grave deficit on the year's working. There was a welcome offer of a donation of £200 at the year's end, if a deficit could be avoided on current account. Efforts were made, with the result that all debts are now wiped out, and there is a balance in hand of £49. However, to put the Mission upon a sound and satisfactory basis, from £120 to £150 increase of income is required. The Missionaries' Reports, which were included, showed clearly what a valuable service is being rendered to the community. The institutions are numerous and healthy. The Sunday congregations and Sunday-schools are highly satisfactory, while every night of the week is filled with classes and lectures and clubs of one sort or another. Winter and summer the activities are incessant, and physical, as well as spiritual, well-being is arrived at. A more useful agency with more varied work could scarcely be imagined, and it is surprising that there should be any difficulty whatever in getting any amount of money necessary for carrying it on efficiently.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, in introducing the subject of the Report, said there was a balance in hand only because of extraordinary effort and generosity which could not be relied upon yearly. He did not believe it was wise to rely upon spasmodic efforts. They could not be always calling upon their friends, for instance, either to provide or to come to concerts and recitals. Every member ought now to make some effort and some sacrifice which should enable the Mission in future to pay its way. Those who have known its work in the past bear testimony to its efficiency, its thoroughness, and its benefit to the community. Its missionaries were devoted to the true elevation of their brothers and sisters; and surely the subscribers ought to take their share in promoting such a noble enterprise, and giving all the encouragement possible to the men who, amidst many difficulties, faithfully discharge the practical work of the Mission.

Mr. Charles W. Jones (President of the B. and F.U.A.) moved the following resolution:—

That the sixty-sixth annual report be adopted, and that this meeting accord to the missionaries, the Rev. S. H. Street and the Rev. J. W. Bishop, its heartfelt thanks for their earnest and beneficent labours; having confidence in their work, and rejoicing tosee the true Christian spirit manifesting itself in so many and such varied forms of Christian helpfulness.

He referred to the foundation principle upon which the Domestic Missions were originally built, and claimed that although the methods had changed and the work had enlarged, that principle had not been violated—namely, the implanting of religion in the hearts and souls of the poor and ignorant and sinning. People who said recreation was wrong as a part of mission work, did not know anything about it from actual experience. Their object was not to give a list of souls saved, and yet in Manchester and Liverpool and London there were respectable tradesmen who would acknowledge that they, having had parents who neglected them in childhood, were rescued from the gutter by the Domestic Mission. Many people are so short-sighted. They look in at the Mission entertainments, and see well-dressed men and women there, and think that women with bonnets and men with collars cannot be poor people. But they are dressed respectably owing to the influence of such agencies as the Mission. There is as much need for mission work to-day as there was sixty-six years ago. He knew something of the difficulties and discouragements that confronted the missionary, and therefore he claimed for them a large share of sympathy and good will.

The Rev. Joseph Wain, of Trowbridge, seconded the resolution. In his remarks he laid stress upon the desirability of making the Mission buildings as beautiful and bright and attractive as possible. He had visited the Renshaw-street Mission that morning, and had been disappointed with the accommodation and arrangement of the building. Manchester people ought to be able to provide more efficient Halls than that. They should be altogether different and better than the homes of the people—having bright pictures, providing sweet music. He knew from experience what a strain it was upon the missionary's feelings to go into squalid homes where wretchedness and want and vice abound. He knew not only of the missionary's success, but also of his failures—yet not absolute failures, for he believed that every good seed sown must spring up and grow somewhere and at some time. He gave some of his personal experiences while himself a missionary at Bristol, and urged that all those present should go and make themselves personally acquainted with the work of the Mission, and also take a special interest in some given family.

The Rev. S. H. Street, in acknowledging the resolution, said it was good to know that the missionaries had the sympathy and confidence of the subscribers. Though there were difficulties and disadvantages attending their work, there were also compensations. He gave a few word pictures of his own district, and showed that although it was by no means one of the very poorest parts of Manchester, there were peculiar inducements for the men to frequent the public house, and for the children to spend their evenings in the street. The efforts of himself and his fellow-workers were mainly to get the young people into the Mission and stir up some ambitions within them, some yearnings for more knowledge, and desire to equip themselves for higher positions in society. There were many beer houses in the district, and in order to provide the men with a counter attraction, the Cosie Nooke was established, so that they might have a sort of club life on temperance principles. The effort had proved of great value, though it was clear that it could never be self-supporting. There was an important way in which the business men of Manchester might help them, and that was by letting them know of any openings they had for boys. Many a boy connected with the Mission was qualified and anxious to make his way in the world, but the difficulty was in helping him to get a start.

The Rev. J. W. Bishop also responded, and spoke of the character of his work at Willert-street. His appeal for sympathy and help was graphic and touching, and went home to the hearts of those who heard him. The missionary, he said, was policeman, relieving-officer, and minister in turns; and though some had expressed fears lest the work of the Missions would have to be curtailed through want of funds, he was more than convinced that if only the members of their churches could see for themselves how appalling was the evil which the Mission had to combat, they would at once determine that the work should be increased, and gladly subscribe the money needed for the purpose.

On the motion of Colonel Pilcher, seconded by Mr. S. B. Worthington, the Chairman, officers, and Committee were elected for the ensuing year.

On the motion of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, seconded by Mr. Barker, a hearty vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor was passed, for the use of his parlour; and on the motion of the Rev. D. Agate, seconded by the Rev. C. Roper, a vote of thanks was accorded to the Rev. S. A. Steinthal for presiding over the meeting.

The proceedings then terminated.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Blackpool: Banks-street.—On Wednesday week a tea-meeting and social entertainment took place in the old school-room adjoining the church, and was well attended. The Rev. D. Davis, who presided, after expressing gratification at the large attendance, and appreciation of the kindness of the host (Mr. Houldsworth), offered a hearty welcome to visitors and friends from other churches, and said the occasion was especially interesting to many friends present, as it was the last social gathering they could have on that building. The building was old, and in many respects unfit for further use, and was about to be superseded by a new, larger and more commodious one. This, they hoped, would be opened in a few weeks time. The estimated cost of the new building is £600, and of that £370 had been raised.

Boston.—On Sunday evening the service was conducted by Mr. Pratt, of London, who preached to a good congregation on "The Problem of the Book of Job."

Cullompton.—The spring meeting of the Devonshire Ministers' Conference was held here on Monday last. At the afternoon Conference the following were present:—The Revs. J. Barron (Tavistock), J. S. Mathers, M.A. (Plymouth), F. T. Reed (Moretonhampstead), T. B. Broadrick (Bridgwater), J. Worthington, B.A. (Taunton), and Major-General Jacob (Tavistock), President of the Western Union. A public tea was subsequently held in the schoolroom, followed by a public meeting in the chapel, presided over by Major-General Jacob. The speeches were interspersed with vocal and instrumental music.

Darlington.—On Sunday week a Martineau memorial service was conducted by the Rev. A. Harvie.

Deal.—On Tuesday, March 20, a meeting was held at the Free Christian Church, to offer a welcome to the Rev. Thomas Shakspeare, who has undertaken the ministry here. The Rev. S. G. Preston, of Hastings, conducted the devotional part of the meeting, after which Mr. E. Chitty, of Dover, took the chair, and spoke some very kind words of encouragement to the congregation, and gave a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Shakspeare. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie expressed his sympathy with the church, and hoped that it would prosper under Mr. Shakspeare's leading. The Revs. A. J. Marchant, S. G. Preston, and S. Burrows followed, expressing a hope that the church would give their earnest and constant support to the minister. Mr. George Chitty, of Dover, and Mr. E. Mace, of Tenden, also spoke some kindly words. Mr. Dorrington Boyle extended a welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Shakspeare on behalf of the congregation. The Rev. T. Shakspeare, in returning thanks, said that the church existed to foster purity of heart and life, and to help them all to come into communion with the Heavenly Father. That was its divine mission, and they could all help it on by living in the spirit of love and charity. But to that spirit of love and charity they must add the spirit of a wise rationalism and the spirit of Christian fortitude. The meeting, which was bright and encouraging, was closed by hymn and benediction. Prior to the meeting, Mr. Edward Chitty entertained the friends at a tea at the Beach House Temperance Hotel.

Derby.—The Friar-gate Chapel Literary and Musical Society brought its seventeenth season to a close on Tuesday week, when a social and musical evening was held in the lower schoolroom. The arrangements were carried out by the president of the society (the Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S.), and Mr. H. Jones, the hon. secretary. There was a capital attendance, including members of the choir, Young People's Religious Union, and the football club, who were present as guests of the president. Mr. W. Crowther, who has kindly assisted the society on many occasions, gave a most lucid and interesting sketch of "Charles Kingsley and his Works," and songs and other items completed the programme, which was greatly enjoyed. The anniversary of the Sunday-school was held on Sunday week, when the Rev. J. Birks preached morning and evening. In the afternoon, Mr. S. D. Hall conducted a children's service. Collections were made at each service. On the following Wednesday the Young People's Religious Union held a meeting, at which were present, by invitation, the members of the Gospel Hall Christian Endeavour Society. The Rev. J. Birks presided, and addresses were delivered by the Chairman and Messrs. S. D. Hall and J. Larratt. Mr. Gibson, of the Gospel Hall Christian Endeavour Society gave an excellent address on the topic, "Success in Service."

Huddersfield.—A successful sale of work was held on Wednesday and Thursday, Mar. 21 and 22, in the schoolroom of the Fitzwilliam-street Church, to provide funds for the current year and to meet the expense of a new boiler for the heating apparatus. The sale on Wednesday was opened by Mrs. Joseph Woodhead, of Longdenholme, the Rev. W. Mellor presiding, and there were also present the Revs. A. Chalmers, E. C. Jones, Mr. E. Basil Lupton and others. The Chairman referred to the bazaar of the previous year, which had relieved them from the burden of a troublesome debt, and said that the sale was to keep them out of debt. Mrs. Woodhead, in declaring the sale open, spoke highly of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Mellor in Huddersfield. On the second day the sale was opened by Mr. J. C. Bates, Mr. A. Whitworth in the chair. The receipts amounted to £81 18s. 2d.

Hull.—On Sunday-evening last the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., delivered the first of a series of four lectures on Shakespeare's comedies, having the general heading of "The Grave Beneath the Gay," and including the treatment of the respective plays: The Merchant of Venice, Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night. The lecture attracted a very large and attentive audience who much appreciated the great force and insight with which the subject was handled.

Kirkcaldy.—The annual soirée was held in the church on Monday, the 26th inst., there being between seventy and eighty present. After tea the Chairman, in his opening remarks, referred to that being the first anniversary of the occupation of the new church. The Rev. A. E. Parry also spoke. Mr. Kirkhope, the treasurer of St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, in an encouraging speech, referred to the many ties existing between the congregations of Edinburgh and Kirkcaldy. Thereafter an excellent programme was brought to a close by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

London: Little Portland-street.—The report submitted at the recent annual meeting shows that the past year has been one of transition; the Rev. H. Rawlings, M.A., having left in October, after more than eight years' ministry at the chapel; his successor, the Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., not entering on the work until January, 1900. The interval was filled partly by the Special Services Committee borrowing the chapel for six morning services, conducted by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. Mr. Perris began his ministry and his superintendence of the Portland Sunday-school and Institute at the beginning of the year, with great hopes of being able to draw the bonds of the chapel and the Institute into closer relation, thus making our only chapel in the heart of London a real centre of free thought and religious life for the immediate neighbourhood. The meetings of the Congregational Society connected with the chapel have, therefore, this winter been made to include a good many very good popular lectures which should also appeal to the members of the Young Men's Club and Institute. The last lecture of the season was given last Wednesday, the 28th inst., by Mr. Perris, on "Napoleon the Great," and several others have been given by members of S.P.E. League on various subjects, and all have been illustrated with lantern views. There is much good work waiting to be done in the Institute, if only volunteers could be found in the autumn to help at the evening clubs and classes, or to teach in the Sunday-school. The congregation are most anxious that, being situated so that many visitors passing through London attend the services in the spring specially, they should receive support from all those interested in making such a central chapel worthy of the good work that is being done in its neighbourhood, and not unworthy of the tradition left to it by the ministry of Dr. Martineau.

London: Stamford-street.—On the 24th, at the Pleasant Saturday Evening for the People, the speaker was Mr. Fred. Maddison, M.P., who gave a stirring and eloquent address on the subject of Total Abstinence, and spoke in strong terms of the inconsistency of the working men, who were loud in their demand for shorter hours of labour, but forgot the claims of the poor women behind the public-house bars, whose hours of work were from early morning till late at night. The Rev. Frederic Allen presided, and a hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Maddison, on the proposition of Messrs. Welch and Montford. On a recent occasion Mrs. Ormiston Chant was the speaker, who also sang several songs, as did Mr. John Pilcher, much to the delight of the audience, by whom the P.S.E. are greatly enjoyed.

London: Welsh Services.—It is very satisfactory to report that the earnestness of the friends as Essex Hall during the last few months has been rewarded with real and active progress. Among recent preachers have been Mr. Gwilym Evans, B.A., and the Rev. E. E. Jenkins of Manchester College, Oxford; Messrs. Islan Jones and E. J. Williams, of Jesus College, Oxford; and Mr. Dan Jones and Dr. T. Evans. The attendance was large on each occasion, showing a very satisfactory increase. At the beginning of this year Mr. John Davies (the treasurer of the movement), advanced a sum required to procure a large number of Hymn Books which were much needed at the services. To pay off this debt a Welsh concert was organised, and passed off very successfully on Thursday evening, March 22. Mr. John Evans presided, and in a short address congratulated the faithful band at Essex Hall on their success and good work done, and wished every progress in the future. The Revs. H. Woods Perris and T. E. M. Edwards also gave short addresses, which were full of encouragement, and expressed their desire to see the Welsh Unitarians in London, in a near future, possessing a church of their own. The concert included a number of both English and Welsh songs. There were also recitations and a farce. After an appeal by the secretary for gifts towards the Welsh section of the forthcoming Bazaar, the concert terminated with singing the Welsh National song and chorus, "Hen Wlad fy Nhadau."

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Sunday last Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, and a musical and liturgical service was rendered by the scholars. The day's exercises were much enjoyed, and the offertories showed a gratifying increase. On the following Monday evening Miss Rose, the superintendent, gave a scholars' party in the schoolroom, to which the teachers, church committee, and church-workers were also invited. The programme consisted of music, games, phonograph and refreshments. During the evening a vote of thanks to Miss Rose for her thoughtful kindness, and acknowledging her long-continued devotion to the school, was proposed and carried by acclamation, also a vote of thanks to Mr. Lambelle for his valued services on the previous day. The Sunday-school is now progressing favourably with great promise of good results.

Trowbridge.—The public recognition of the Rev. J. Wain, formerly of Lewin's Mead Mission, Bristol, as minister of the Conigre General Baptist Church, took place on Wednesday, 14th inst. After tea in the schoolroom, a meeting was held in the chapel, Mr. W. Walker in the chair, supported by the minister, the Revs. A. N. Blatchford and F. W. Stanley, Mr. H. E. Bunce (Frome) and Mr. Bushrod (Southampton). After a few opening remarks by the Chairman, Mr. Wain alluded to the work he hoped to be able to carry on in connection with the church, and Mr. T. Brinson, senior deacon, on behalf of the church and congregation, gave him the hand of fellowship, and extended to him a hearty welcome, assuring him of the support and sympathy of the people in his labours. Addresses were given by the several gentlemen named, who made reference to their former acquaintance with the Conigre Church, also the good work done by Mr. Wain in connection with Lewin's Mead Mission, Bristol. Congratulations were presented to the Conigre people on the happy choice they had made in selecting Mr. Wain as their pastor, and the speakers wished him God-speed in his work. Before closing the meeting Mr. Wain paid a tribute to the memory of the late Mr. John Elliott, a faithful worker in connection with the church and in the town. A resolution of sympathy with the family was unanimously passed, and a collection made for the purpose of sending a wreath.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WRITING in the midst of the delightful gatherings of the National Conference at Leicester, we can only report this week a part of the proceedings, and even of the first two days, of which we give here some record, the most beautiful and impressive things cannot be reported. We shall publish next week in full Mr. Stopford Brooke's Memorial Address on Dr. Martineau; but we cannot reproduce what went deeper than the words in the tone of its delivery and the spirit of the gathering; nor can we record the deep impression of the Communion service in the Great Meeting, and the Wednesday morning service of devotion. The overflowing kindness of hospitable friends, both of our own and other communions, the gracious courtesy of the Mayor at his reception, the most admirable arrangements both for the pleasure and the effectiveness of the meetings, will be gratefully recognised by all who were present; and altogether we may say that the happy expectations with which we went to Leicester have been more than realised.

THE INDIAN FAMINE BRAHMO SOMAJ FUND.—Mr. Ion Pritchard acknowledges receipt of the following donations:—Mr. J. R. Wilson, £1 1s.; Miss Estlin, £1 1s.; A. K. R., £1; E. A. D., £1 1s.; Miss Swain, £2; Mrs. Holland, £1 1s.; A Widow's Mite, 10s.; H. B., £2; Mrs. T. L. Browne, £10; Mr. S. S. Tayler, £2 2s.; Miss E. T. Smith, £2; Mrs. R. Moore, £1; Mrs. F. W. Meyer, £10; Airmount, £1; M. and L., £1; Miss Worsley, £1 1s.; Miss Preston, £5; Miss Purdie, 10s.; A. M. R., £2 2s.; Mrs. G. Melly, £5; Mr. Rendall, £1 1s.; Rev. G. Fox, £1; Miss Lambley, £2. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall, Essex-street, London, W.C.

MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.—The first annual meeting of the Ministerial Fellowship was held on Tuesday afternoon, before the Conference meetings, in the Temperance Hall, Leicester. The Rev. C. C. Coe, F.R.G.S., presided, in the unavoidable absence of the president, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A. There was a good attendance of members. The report and financial statement were adopted, the balance in hand being £117 10s. Five new members were elected, bringing the total membership to date up to eighty-four. The Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., was elected president; the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., treasurer; the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., secretary; and vacancies on the committee were supplied by the election of Revs. A. H. Dolphin, H. E. Dowson, B.A., and William Harrison. Mr. A. E. Piggott, F.S.A.A., and the Rev. W. R. Shanks were elected auditors.

THE concert given by Miss Winifred Robinson, on Thursday week, at Essex Hall, in aid of the funds of the London Unitarian Bazaar was, from the musical point of view, a gratifying success, and while we should have been glad to see the hall much more crowded, there was a good audience, which must have secured a substantial addition to the funds. Mme. Carrie Blackwell was the vocalist, and a glee party also contributed three items to the programme. The orchestra, under Miss Robinson's direction, played with great spirit. Mr. Ivor James was the solo violoncellist, and Miss Robinson herself contributed three violin solos, which were very warmly received. The concert altogether was greatly enjoyed, and the Entertainments' Committee are again to be congratulated on what they have achieved.

AN INVOCATION.

O COME, when we aspire
To make the better choice;
Fulfil, O God, our heart's desire
And bid the soul rejoice.

O come! and wings of morn
Our orison shall take,
When, from the womb of night reborn,
We still with Thee awake.

Come in the vesper prayer
When day's long task is done:
Come, brood upon the hallowed air
From dawn to set of sun.

And in the silent night,
If sleep forsake our eyes,
O come in many an angel flight
Of thoughts that scale the skies.

Come in the scene of strife,
And let us on the field
All through the long campaign of life
Still fight behind Thy shield.

Then desert rock shall own
Thy quickening stroke, O God,
And living waters from the stone
Shall well beneath Thy rod.

Unseal the mystic fount,
Nor let our lips be dumb;
Speak with us in the holy mount—
Come, sacred Presence, come!

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF

UNITARIAN, LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, FREE CHRISTIAN, PRESBYTERIAN

AND OTHER

NON-SUBSCRIBING OR KINDRED CONGREGATIONS.

THE Seventh Triennial Meeting of the Conference opened at Leicester on Tuesday afternoon, ministers, delegates, and other friends being received at the Great Meeting Schools in the afternoon by Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., and other members of the reception committee. At four o'clock Mr. Clephan took the chair, and in a few cordial words welcomed the members of the Conference to Leicester, after which Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., the President, having acknowledged the welcome, delivered his address.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Ministers and Delegates,

Once more we meet in conference as representatives of the Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Churches. And it is my duty to open this our seventh Triennial Conference by delivering a Presidential address. In such an address it is usual, I believe, for the speaker to call attention to the events which have occurred since the last Conference—or rather to such of them as he deems of special importance to the group of churches whose representatives he is addressing. If that be my duty, then there is one event which has happened during the last three years which is of paramount importance to our Free Churches. We have lost the man who was our leader. On January 11 of this year died James Martineau; and his loss, to my mind, overshadows in importance all other events which have affected especially our group of churches since we last met at Sheffield.

We have lost our leader, James Martineau, the greatest thinker, theologian, and philosopher among us—may I not say, the greatest thinker, theologian, and philosopher of his age? I am no philosopher, no theologian. I cannot speak of his work and influence in such matters; others must do that. But I can give expression to my own esteem and affection for the man who in such kindly manner received me at his house in Gordon-street when I was a lad at University Hall. I know how dear he was to the congregations that listened to his sermons and to the students who gathered to his lectures. We all grieve to think that we shall see no more that lofty brow, that genial smile, that noble presence. But his writings remain to us; we shall lovingly cherish his memory, and prize the principles which he laid down.

Speaking, however, as your President in this the first official utterance since his death, it is right that I should dwell especially on the great service that Dr. Martineau rendered to this National Conference. I refer to his famous speech at Leeds, when he laid before us his Organisation Scheme. I remember well the intense interest with which that large audience sat spell-bound while Dr. Martineau, who had then just passed his eighty-fourth birthday, spoke on and on, with force unabated and clearness unsurpassed. I remember well the impression that that speech made on all of us, how he convinced us all of the necessity of husbanding and organising our forces, of improving the education and increasing the stipends of our ministers, and uniting ministers and laymen in organised work for the common cause.

And let no one imagine that Dr. Martineau's scheme was abortive, or that his great speech produced no tangible result. The contrary is the fact. It is true that with the details of his scheme we do not all agree. Some of us thought that in his speech he too much ignored our existing organisations, and too little recognised the good work that was actually being done. But with the motive and spirit of his speech, with its aim and object, we were all in accord. That something should be done and done at once, and that it should be something on the lines of Dr. Martineau's scheme, we were all convinced. Accordingly after a full discusssion, a committee of sixteen gentlemen was appointed "to submit the scheme contained in Dr. Martineau's paper to the churches, societies, associations, &c., to collect opinions thereon, and to call a meeting of the Conference at some future date." This committee reported to a Special Conference held at Nottingham on March 6, 1890. At that meeting important resolutions were carried, which have borne good fruit and done much to amend the constitution and increase the efficiency of our district associations. In the first place, boundaries were re-arranged, so as to secure that practically the whole of England should be covered with local associations, under which all, or nearly all, our churches might be grouped. In the South-Eastern Counties, where no district association existed, the Provincial Assembly of Non-Subscribing Ministers and Congregations of London and the South-Eastern Counties was formed—an assembly which, with the aid of its two excellent ministers-at-large, Rev. T. W. Freckleton and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, has done so much to support the isolated and outlying congregations in the Home Counties. The creation of this assembly, and the good work which it has done, is entirely due to the movement initiated by Dr. Martineau's great speech at Leeds.

Another good result sprang from the same cause. It was found that our district associations had every variety of name, and also every variety of constitution. In a few cases it was necessary to alter the name of a local association to some more comprehensive title, so as to embrace all churches included in the title of this Conference. And this was gladly done. Next, it was felt to be urgently desirable that each local association should represent the congregations within its district; that is, that its committee or other governing body should consist of representatives elected directly by those churches. Some of our local associations had already a representative constitution of this kind. All the others—I believe without exception—adopted such a constitution before the next meeting of this Conference. And now in all our English district associations the principle of representation of churches has been adopted; for which again we primarily must thank Dr. Martineau.

One other reference I will make to his great speech at Leeds. No one who was present and heard that speech will ever forget the emphasis with which Dr. Martineau pronounced these two sentences:—

> If anyone, being a Unitarian, shrinks on fitting occasions from plainly calling himself so, he is a sneak and a coward. If, being of our catholic communion, he calls his chapel, or its congregation, Unitarian, he is a traitor to his spiritual ancestry, and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors.

It is perhaps necessary to refer once more to this famous passage, because there has been a tendency in some directions, amid the chorus of laudatory comments on Dr. Martineau's life and work, to speak of him as though he were a member of no denomination, far above petty sectarian differences of opinion, and as one who declined to label himself a Unitarian. He objected most sturdily to chapels and trusts and congregations being labelled "Unitarian"; for that, he thought, would fetter posterity. But he never objected to any individual saying "I am a Unitarian." He never objected, on fitting occasion, so to describe himself. In the last year of his life, he sent a contribution to the Permanent Chapel Building Fund, which the London Unitarians are now raising to build new chapels in the metropolis.

I well remember that one of the first bits of work I had to do, when I was placed upon the Book Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was to read the manuscript of Dr. Martineau's Preface to Mr. Hall's translation of Professor Bonet-Maury's "Early Sources of English Unitarianism." Why this was given to me I know not; what I was to do with it, I cannot think. I know I had sense enough not to touch or alter one word of it. But I can remember to this day, that clear, neat, upright writing which we all knew so well. And, above all, I was greatly struck by one powerful and beautiful passage in that Preface, the value and importance of which has not, I think, been generally recognised.

Dr. Martineau had been dealing with the various events and trains of thoughts which Mr. Bonet-Maury and others had suggested as sources from which English Unitarianism had sprung. He proceeds thus:—

> But there is one unorthodox influence so powerful and so extensively diffused as almost to supersede inquiry into the personal pedigree of English Unitarianism—I mean, the English Bible. It is difficult for us to realise the startling effect of throwing open to Europe, in its vernacular tongues a Sacred Literature vehemently contrasted, in matter, in form, in spirit, with the ecclesiastical stereotype of Christianity.

[Dr. Odgers, having further quoted this striking passage at length, proceeded to speak of the controversy of Dr. St. George Mivart with the Roman Catholic Church, and then concluded his address as follows.]

And here I will venture to say one word in contravention of an opinion recently expressed by this Conference. At our meeting at Sheffield, in April, 1897, a resolution was carried, the latter portion of which ran as follows: "That in the opinion of this Conference no settlement of the Education Question can be regarded as satisfactory and final which does not provide that only secular education shall be, directly or indirectly, paid for out of public funds." I know that the members of the Free Churches will listen with patience to a man who ventures to express opinions with which they disagree. I am emboldened, therefore, to tell you that, in my humble opinion, that resolution was a mistake. I think it is a sad confession of weakness, if men who call themselves Unitarian Christians are driven to such a last resort as purely secular education. Surely, there is some other solution of the religious difficulty—if a religious difficulty still exists. Let the education given in our Board Schools be unsectarian, let it be independent of all ecclesiastical control; but surely, it need not be secular! What harm can there be in our children being taught the Lord's Prayer or the Twenty-third Psalm? If it is right that the children in our Board Schools should study the lives of Socrates, Milton, and Washington, and learn from them lessons of self-sacrifice and patriotism and devotion to duty, then, surely, it is right and proper that they should study also the life of One who was greater than all these. From what source can lessons of devotion to duty and self-sacrificing love be better learnt than from the life of Christ?

But, however we may differ on this point, there is one thing on which the churches represented here to-day are all agreed. To us, the Book of Revelation is not closed. We do not shut the door in the face of modern thought or modern science. We welcome man's ever-widening knowledge of God's truth: we welcome it in matters of religion and duty as much as in matters of astronomy or engineering. We do not erect a rigid wall of dogma to exclude new light and new truth, and then pretend we have within its pale all that now is, or ever has been, or ever shall be necessary for salvation. We do not disregard the teachings of the past. We look back to the face of Jesus Christ: we study his words, and strive to obey his precepts. And from other voices of the days that are gone—from prophets, apostles, and martyrs—we learn lessons of which the world is still in need. Nor do we neglect the teachings of the present; for in these days, too, there are many voices which proclaim God's holy truth. But we also look forward to the future. We crave more light; for knowledge grows from more to more. Now "we know in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away."

At the conclusion of his address, Dr. Odgers offered on behalf of the Conference a welcome to delegates from other countries. They should have been glad, he said, to welcome representatives from many countries, had it been possible, but they had actually with them Professor N. P. Gilman, of Meadville, Pa., whom, with Mrs. Gilman, they were delighted to welcome to their gathering. Mr. Gilman, who was Professor of Sociology at Meadville, and working editor of the New World, came to them as delegate from the National Conference of Unitarian Churches in America.

Professor Gilman, in responding to the welcome, said that he felt it a great honour and privilege to bring to them the greetings of the American National Conference. He and Mrs. Gilman had not felt that they had come to a foreign country. If home was on the other side of the Atlantic, they had now come to the old home, of which they were always proud and happy to think. Though they had been greeted on their arrival by the East wind with which they were so familiar in Boston, there had been no East in the welcome they had received in the homes of friends. Speaking of American Unitarian affairs, he said that, having been for the last five years 700 miles from Boston, he had not seen much lately of work at the centre, but he had been at the recent National Conference at Washington, and while they missed the leaders on whom they formerly relied, Hedge, Clarke, Bellows, and the chief of their present leaders, such men as Everett, Collyer, Toy, Savage, had been absent from that meeting, he had been struck by the number of extremely able young men present and taking part in the meetings, and he was convinced that whatever might be the present condition of their churches, their future was secure. He felt that there was now promise that at last Unitarianism might be the gospel of the people for the people, by the grace of God. At Meadville, which was the only strictly Unitarian theological training school they had, they were now better equipped with men than ever, and had recently received a number of generous gifts, and expected to be still better provided for in the near future. Of the New World, also, they had good hope that an ample endowment fund would be shortly provided, so that it would be independent of a subscription list, and would be firmly established as a great review, interdenominational, free, and liberal. In carrying out the purpose of the review, they hoped for the hearty co-operation of the scholars and ministers among their English brethren.

On both sides of the ocean they were striving as never before for the fundamental unity, and in great part they were finding it in the unity of social reform, which again must be based on the unity of the spirit of which Dr. Martineau was the great exponent. They in America had been deeply moved by his departure. While some of their thinkers could not accept his metaphysics, and others did not follow him in his ethics as a system, none could resist his spirit, or the example of his great and beautiful life.

At the conclusion of Professor Gilman's address, the company adjourned for tea in the lower school-rooms, and at 6.30 the Communion Service was held in the Great Meeting. The body of the chapel was completely filled, the congregation overflowing into the gallery. The service was conducted by the Rev. C. C. Coe, a former minister of the chapel, and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, the address being given by the former.

SERVICE IN THE TEMPERANCE HALL.

At eight o'clock service was held in the Temperance Hall, where a very large congregation assembled. The service was conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., Sullivan's anthem, "Send out the light," being beautifully sung. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds.

THE SERMON.

OUR WORK FOR THE COMMON CAUSE.

"Now, I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfected together in the same mind and in the same judgment." —1 Cor. i. 10.

So wrote Paul to the little community at Corinth, which he had won for Christ by eighteen months assiduous preaching. It was only three or four years they had existed as a Christian Church, and already there were divisions among them. Paul had his adherents, and Peter and Apollos each had theirs, and there were those who made a party name even of him whom all owned alike, through whose gospel they had all been won to God. So the Apostle beseeches, argues, exhorts, effaces his own personality, and abates the dignity of his office, if haply he may win them back to unity, that they might call themselves henceforth after no other name but Christ's, and all call themselves by his name: "We are Christ's, and Christ is God's," the sufficient bond of a perfect union. Paul's entreaties availed little; true we hear no more of these particular parties against which he so earnestly protested. But only a generation later, under leaders more willing and less reputable than Apostles, the spirit of party still was rampant, and the divisions of this Church were, as Clement tells us, the grief, the scandal, and the danger of Christianity at large.

Years went on, and the world became Christian. Rome turned to worship the Christ she had mocked, and the nations once subject to her, and barbarian tribes who had maintained a fierce independence of her sway, all together bowed before the same Lord and called themselves by his name. On this all Churches were agreed, that the counsel of Paul was not his own, but spoken by the Holy Spirit, and to be received as the very word of God; and in this all Churches were alike, that they were more or less divided within and at strife with one another. Heedless of the meaning of Paul's exhortation, even while they worshipped the letter of it, Christians distinguished themselves from Christians by assuming party names, or by imputing them to the disrepute of those to whom they were opposed. "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas," might be taken as the motto of ecclesiastical history. The principle of division and discord is ever present; while only the persons, whose names are used or abused to sanction it, vary from age to age. And to-day, when the Christian Church stands upon the threshold of the twentieth century since its founder's birth, to-day the divisions are more numerous than they have been before; sects form themselves apart, less savage against one another than of old, but not less determined each of them to maintain its seclusion; nor less earnest, more than one, in the proclamation of itself as the only proprietor of the ordinary means of grace and sole custodian of divine revelation.

"In one spirit were all baptised into one body," writes St. Paul. "I believe in the communion of saints," is the earliest confession of Christian faith, and that communion the Nicene Creed explains to be the "one Catholic and Apostolic Church." Such is the theory of Christianity; but history gives us no choice except either to recognise as One Communion those who refuse all communion with each other, or to choose among the many bodies a single one which shall alone have the right to take to itself the title "Church of God," by which Paul designates the Christian community of his day.

To the latter alternative many have inclined; it seems so simple and so logical, and offers a solution of all religious difficulties by the acknowledgment of a living authority, arbiter of differences, and guardian of revealed truth. Only the Facts are against it,—the Works by which faith is shown and proved, without which the boast of true faith is vain; these are not of any one Church, but are found in every Christian body, and distinguished as Christ's the Society of Friends equally with the Little Sisters of the Poor.

We are forced, then, to this conclusion, inept as at first sight it may appear, that "we who are many," not many individuals merely, but many in opinion, in faith, and in practice, that we are all somehow "one body." Some call themselves, or are called, after the names of men—Calvinists, Arminians, Wesleyans, Socinians; some get their names from a conspicuous tenet they agree to affirm or deny, as in our own case, who cannot escape the Unitarian name, however reluctant we may be to be so labeled; others are named by their form of government, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians; and others from places with which they are chiefly connected—Rome, or Greece, or England. What are these, all of them, but varied forms of the old party names—Paul and Apollos and Cephas, over again? And now and always are some who try to escape all sects by owning no other name than Christ's, and yet do not and cannot succeed. For they are still what they are, whether they avow or whether they deny the name. The English Evangelical, the Italian or Spanish Roman Catholic, the liberal Unitarian—each would use the Christian name as his own; but each uses it in his own peculiar sense, and by no means will agree to that intended by the others. And we are forced to admit that there is no legitimate party of Christ now, any more than there was in Corinth; and if any insist upon the name, our answer is Paul's own, "Is Christ divided? If any trust in himself that he is Christ's, let him consider this again with himself, that even as he is Christ's, so also are we." The name is common to us all; yet does it so apply as not to heal our differences or unite us before the world.

For in truth, what Paul demanded was too much for human frailty, and the very terms of his expostulation betray the exorbitance of his entreaty, "When one says, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not men?" Even so, dear saint of God, yet thou thyself not exalted above human infirmity! We are men, and impossible is it, as all history has shown, that we should ever be "of the same mind and the same judgment," and there be no division among us. We are, indeed, men; and it means that the bulk of us are short-sighted and ignorant, and liable to error, and prone to obstinacy, and vanity, and self-assertion, and confident of ourselves and our opinions. Our virtues as well as our vices divide us against one another; our learning sides with our ignorance to perpetuate dispute. In vain has the way of compromise been tried. It has never been large enough to include all, and of necessity must exclude those who believe in a definite historic revelation from which nothing can be taken, and to which nothing can be added. Equally in vain has it been tried by the assertion of divine authority, to compel all into one fold, for there always have been and will be multitudes who do not and cannot submit their judgment, though it is in the name of God their fellows adjure them.

There are divisions among us, as there were at Corinth; they are many and deep and wide, and, as it seems at present, hopeless of filling up or of bridging over. Attempts have, indeed, been made in our day to draw closer together the various Churches which come under the common designation of Evangelical Dissent. For whatever success has rewarded the persistent efforts we are thankful, and we rejoice that the good work done by our brethren is made easier and more efficacious by their union. But how little hope is there of any drawing together of the older Churches, or of more than a bare toleration being secured by those who are, like ourselves, further off from the general agreement! Shall we, in a hundred years hence, have come to an agreement? Shall we all belong to one Church, or all recognise as good and wise the variety of Churches? Shall we all partake of the same outward sign, of the same inward grace common to all?

Nay, I venture to prophesy that in a thousand years hence the same great divisions will cleave the Christian world as now. For it is by nature, as well as by thought and training, that men are Catholic or Protestant, High Church or Evangelical, Unitarian or Orthodox.

But I am no prophet, and my prophecy is of no worth. I take the facts of to-day and to-morrow—facts quite independent of our judgment on them, whether we approve them as natural and salutary, or condemn them as a violation of God's purpose. And I ask—What can we do? What should be our attitude towards the Churches divided against one another, and united only against us?

Against them we cannot unite, for they compel our sympathy and respect so that we must needs wish them God-speed in their work, even while they stand aloof from us and bid us keep our distance. If now and again we are stirred to wrath by some grosser act of intolerance or injustice, and are tempted to denounce their false doctrine and bigotry, we are speedily brought to reason by the consideration of our own remissness and their energy, and the curse our lips were fain to utter is changed into a blessing. For we are as liable to error, as prone to self-assertion and dogmatism as they are; and are they not in zeal for God examples to us, in labours for the common weal our rivals, in learning no whit our inferiors? We can in no wise affect to despise the fellowship we are refused, nor make light of that communion of saints from which we are excluded. The loss to us is very serious, the pain of it is sorely felt by many.

Shall we, then, sue for reunion, and humbly desire conditions of peace? But we know them already, and we know them to be such as it is impossible for us to accept. For our convictions are not subject to choice, that we can form them at command, or alter them to suit even our spiritual interests; nor do we deem it lawful to withhold expression of them for the sake of greater usefulness any more than for the sake of gain.

We must needs, then, remain Dissenters from orthodox Dissent, and Protestants against popular Protestantism; the minority of a minority, tracing back a thin and doubtful line of ancestry till we find ourselves firmly grounded in the Unitarian declaration of the great founder of Christianity: "One there is who is good—if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments."

But have we no office in the Church Universal? Is there nothing we may do for Christendom and mankind? no truth committed specially to our keeping? Must we resign ourselves to be, as the Gibeonites, "hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation," but never presume ourselves to claim "part in the Lord," or right of worship in the common sanctuary? Ours to serve in Parliament and on Town Councils and Committees, to look after the health and welfare of the people at large, but to hold back our hands from the Ark of the Covenant, and admit ourselves unworthy of religious fellowship? No! a thousand times no! We will not stay to count heads, or waste time in bewailing deserters, or hesitate lest our voice sound a childish treble when raised against the mighty chorus of Churches unanimous in nothing else but to condemn us. We have our part in Christendom, our witness to bear for the integrity of the Universal Faith.

The late Lady Margaret Professor of Theology at Cambridge once wrote to me:—"The body to which you belong, and yourself, therefore, as one of its representatives, has a work to do for the great common cause. Whether acknowledged by others or not, it contributes its share to the fulness of Christian progress." I cherish the words as coming from one whose orthodoxy has never been called in question, and whose sound judgment and deep learning have won the universal respect of Bible students. Yes, we have a work to do, not for our own communion only, as if to increase in numbers and influence were an end in itself, but for "the great common cause," for the advancement of truth and righteousness on earth.

Nor can it, I think, be doubtful what our special department of work is. It is not to argue and show the falsity of doctrines from which we differ. It is our misfortune that now and again we are forced into controversy, and are driven to attack those whose position we would gladly leave in peace; but this is not our business as a Church. We are militant indeed; but our warfare is not against our brethren and their cherished beliefs, but against the world and its insidious spirit—against the greed of gain, the love of pleasure, the reckless competition, which are the ruin of men's souls. Our negations come to the front because there is so vast a majority opposed to us, and we are bound to make clear why it is that we stand apart and submit to be lonely and few amid the hosts of Christendom. It is our misfortune more than our fault that the name by which we are known has lost its true significance of belief in the Unity of God, and has come to imply disbelief in the Trinity. But there is no strength in negation, nor bond of union, nor principle of growth; and I am persuaded that the weakness of our group of churches proceeds mainly from this: that we deny more than we affirm, that the thought of what we do not believe is always present to our minds, and what we do believe is to very many dubious and vague.

Yet it is faith alone which is life and power. The profession of opinion makes a school of philosophers or politicians; the conviction of truth as the illumination and salvation of souls constitutes a Church. The grain of sand may be very like a grain of mustard seed, of the same size and weight and colour, but the difference is one of kind. It is alive the tiny seed, and has in it therefore almost infinite potentialities; the sand can have no future but to be divided and worn down to finer atoms, or at the best to remain as it is undisturbed from age to age, it cannot grow. What is our inner life, our faith as a Church? Or are we a heap of sand, not seed at all?

What do we believe? What do we teach?

We have no profession of faith like other Churches; and if we were prepared to adopt one, it would not be accepted from me, or even from one of far greater authority among us. It would have to be a joint production, and the attempt to frame it would prove once more how great among us is the love of freedom, and how small the agreement in doctrine.

Assuredly I will not propose to you a creed or confession, nor will I venture even to state what articles of religion they may be on which we can be supposed for the present agreed. But one thing I venture to affirm without fear of contradiction.

WE BELIEVE IN GOD.

"Of course we do!" Yes, of course, because as Homer witnessed of old, "all men stand in need of the gods," and writes Cicero, "since a steadfast unanimity continues to prevail among all men without exception it must be admitted that the gods exist." We dissent from the all but unanimity of Christians, we cannot dissent from the unanimity of the human race. We believe in God, nor are we called upon to justify our faith as reasonable, or find old arguments or new in its favour. We are sufficiently founded on the old maxim, Securus judicat orbis terrarum, the round world is not agreed in vain.

But who or what is God? For still it is true, as Cicero said was the case in his time, "that there is no question on which there is such marked disagreement, or opinions so various and so opposite." Yet thus much we may safely say, that each man's conception of God is the measure of his own capacity of thought and feeling, and that the highest conception ever formed by mortal mind falls short of the truth as far as the finite is short of Infinite. For the supreme God is One than whom no greater can be conceived; One who has all perfection we can imagine, and who is all that the wisest and best of men can be, and is more than all. One, therefore, who is good and just and mighty and wise, who knows and thinks and wills and loves, but all in some incomparably higher way, transcending our highest flight of thought. One, too, who is concerned with us and our doings and sufferings; for not to know were ignorance, not to care were indifference, and these defects of ours cannot be in the All-Perfect. "We too are his offspring," and our hearts cry out for him, and if an earthly father heeds his children's cry, how much more shall the Father in Heaven attend our call and provide for us even before we know our wants or think to make them known to Him.

Nor does it detract in any way from the awful significance of this truth, that all are agreed upon it. God is: God knows: God cares—all who calls themselves Christians, all among us who make any profession of religion admit so much. But if only one man in all the world knew and believed it, the fact would still subsist and would be all important: that the belief is shared by the human race strengthens our conviction of its truth, but neither adds to nor takes away from the infinite fulness it implies.

It is the One Truth, Universal, Eternal. It always was, always will be; is everywhere true. If intelligent beings inhabit Mars, or planets which revolve round other suns than ours, it is as true for them as for us, concerns them equally with us. It was true ten million years ago, when the earth was a fiery globe; it will be so ten million years hence, when it speeds its lone way still, a dead satellite of a cold sun. God alone has neither past nor future, but is. God alone is not here, not there, but One in all place as in all time. It is the Truth, in the contemplation of which man, too, soars above the limits of Time and Space, and all other truths are lost to his view as stars, which, however bright they shine in the darkness, lose themselves and disappear in the light of the rising sun. It is the One Truth on which men are agreed, who disagree on all things else.

How vastly different men are among themselves! In features, complexion, character, stature of mind and body, in customs and clothes, and every respect under which we regard them, they are unlike. But under all is the same broad food-producing earth, and over all arches the same star-lit heavens. So, too, is it with their religions. Doctrines and forms are many and ever varying, and those held most sacred by some are ridiculed by others, those held to be absolutely essential to-day were unknown of old: men cannot believe alike, cannot even pray together. But the same Providence has care of all, sending his rain and causing his sun to shine on just and unjust, on orthodox and misbeliever; the same God is over all, claiming for himself all sincere worship, under whatever name it be addressed.

I would deny nothing, dear brethren, which any of you cherish as helpful to the spiritual life. I would diminish nothing from the importance of any doctrine we commonly hold by as Christian men. But I do assert the supreme importance of this fundamental truth, which denied all is lost, the world becomes an immense self-acting machine, history a meaningless succession of phenomena, and the individual a mere by-product of forces which ignore him.

And this truth is in danger among men, always indeed has held its own with difficulty, and been recognised only when disguised. In old time they worshipped a multitude of divinities, with the One God dimly discerned in the far distance, or not discerned at all. Now, too, as a High Church Bishop tells us, is "there a secret and half-conscious danger in the Church of making an exaggerated Trinity, danger lest the Father should be removed out of sight, out of mind, out of reach, and the Son take his place."* There is danger lest he who taught us to pray to the Father, and trust and love Him above all, should himself (by our fault, not his) hide the Father from us, and take the place of the God he revealed, danger lest three Gods take the place of One.

The Gospel according to Paul contained doctrines which have been the subject of endless dispute, but this was the beginning of his preaching and the end of all his theories, "the good tidings that ye should turn from vain things to the living God." Never has the Christ had so devoted a servant, so enthusiastic a lover, but never with him is the face of God hidden or His sole glory obscured. The consummation of all things is the subjection of all to the Son and of the Son to the Father; and even now as we are Christ's, so Christ is God's. And "as the head of every man is Christ," i.e., as Christ is supreme over all men, "so is God the head of Christ." I am not quoting these as Unitarian texts, or seeking to put any other interpretation upon them than what I believe all will admit, nay, that of the Apostle himself—"that God may be all in all," within us and without us, close to us as the air we breathe, intimate as our own souls. Oh! for some revival of that old experience, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?" And again, "Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever." Experience rarer, it seems to me, in these times than it was of old, but still cherished among us, and we might almost dare to say the peculiar treasure of our small society.

"Let another praise thee and not thine own mouth: a stranger and not thine own lips," says the Hebrew proverb; and, therefore, I gladly accept the witness of one who was an entire stranger to us and denied the possibility of "really cordial intercourse" between such as we are and men of his own views. "In many Unitarian writings," said the Vicar of St. Mary's, Cambridge, some years ago, "just as in some Unitarians I have known, there is a passionate earnestness of devotion which is most striking—a sense of awe in the presence of God. The hymn 'Nearer my God to thee' is an illustration of this. When we recognise this reverence we may well desire to emulate them in it."

That hymn is the chief contribution of Unitarianism to Christian hymnology, and there are not a few of like kind which have been accepted from us for the use of all the Churches. The fact is more eloquent than any words. It points out to us how we, few and insignificant, may serve and help and defend the cause of true religion. Ours to witness for God, to fear Whom is the beginning of wisdom, to see Whom is the consummation of desire, God the first and the last, from Whom all things proceed, and to Whom all things return, in drawing near to Whom all the discipline of life's pleasures and pains finds its meaning, God Whom all need, and in the worship of Whom all are united, even though they try to keep apart.

For all that worship is a drawing nearer to God, who is spirit, in spirit. And those who draw near to God must needs draw nearer to each other. Bodies may keep to different places, lips may repeat divergent formulas, but souls praying truly are moving to the same centre, even though they come from far distant points of the great circumference, and seem to be tending in opposite directions. This is the true communion of saints, this is the essential unity of the Catholic Church throughout the world. The only communion and unity which is possible at present, or perhaps ever will be possible while we worship on earth. And for this communion in spirit, this unity in God, we witness among the Churches, and pray with those who will not pray with us, and preach with Peter that "in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is acceptable to him."—Acts x. 35.

WEDNESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The proceedings on Wednesday began with a devotional service at ten o'clock, in the Temperance Hall, conducted by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., and this was followed by a memorial address on Dr. Martineau by the Rev. Stopford Brooke. That beautiful address we shall be privileged to publish in full next week.

Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., then took the chair, and the following paper was read by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A.:—

THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF OUR FREEDOM AND FAITH AND THE IMPORTANCE OF ITS STUDY.

The subject on which I am asked to address you is "The Historical Development of our Freedon and Faith, and the Importance of its Study." To deal with so large a subject in so short time is in itself no easy task. The mere story is a long one, and the lines of it are somewhat broken. Faith and freedom have seldom marched exactly pari passu in history or in consciousness. The difficulties which attend the independent investigation of Nonconformist history are by no means inconsiderable. The litigation which led to the Dissenters' Chapels Act of 1844 generated an air of suspicion in many quarters which has not yet been blown away; and anyone who is inquisitive about trusts and covenants is regarded as a man who probably wants to reconstruct history for some party purpose, or who is wishful to endanger some vested interest. Documentary evidence is not readily accessible. Dr. W. A. Shaw, in his work on the "Church during the Civil War," tells us how he hoped to make collections for the history of the period from the registers and records of the old London churches; but, says he, "I quickly found that my wish was hopeless of attainment, and I dropped it in despair." We have some excellent chapel histories; my opportunity will not have been wasted if I can prevail upon the present representatives of the old Nonconformist congregations, not merely to preserve, but to print documents; not wasted, indeed, if I can awaken a little historic interest in some of my friends to whom the fact that they statedly worship in a Presbyterian, a General Baptist, or perhaps an Independent chapel, seems to mean no more than if one should say, "You live in a house once occupied by a Wesleyan."

It is sufficiently obvious that the arrest of the Reformation on its intellectual side brought on its appropriate Nemesis in the form of doctrinal division and revolt. It is not so readily perceived that the political settlements of national and territorial Churches, consequent on the renunciation of Papal supremacy, produced their inevitable results in restlessness and inaction. The State, whether embodied in an English king, a German duke, or a Swiss municipality, professed to take over bodily all the jurisdiction that had hitherto been Papal or ecclesiastical. The opposition roused by this assumption, and by consequent practice, has been more operative than any produced by dogmatic differences in the ecclesiastical history of this country. It is the same revolt, whether an Elizabethan Puritan complains of the Queen's injunctions, or a clergyman of our Reformed church pours contempt on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in our own day. The assumption led, directly, to the Tudor-Stuart theory of the divine right of kings: indirectly, to the divine right of bishops. The opposition to it was embodied in Puritanism, with its two forms, Presbyterianism, demanding a National Church with some power of self-determination and self-reformation; and Separatism, abjuring all relation to State or parish, and seeking to establish a theocratic polity, wherever two or three of like mind were gathered together.
